Trainer of Boxers Gives Diet Hints

To Kid Howard of Chicago and his new system of training and conditioning, Sammy Mandell, the present lightweight boxing champion of the world, gives a great deal of the credit for his meteoric rise to stardom in the world of pugilism. When Mandell first started fighting, he was small, weak and undeveloped, but after turning himself over to Howard it was only a short time before he took the decision from Sid Terris of New York that resulted in him being recognized as the boss of the lightweights.

Sammy Mandell.

Howard's system is unique in that it works no hardship on the athlete who is in training. Unlike the systems that have been used for years, this prominent and successful trainer of men makes conditioning more of a pleasure than a distasteful necessity. Instead of demanding that his men eat only certain things he advises them to eat what they want and when they want it as long as it is cooked in a proper manner. Mr. Howard, in a recent interview on the subject of diet and condition, said, in part: "Years ago it was a task, and an unpleasant one, for a boxer or a wrestler to train for a bout because he was forced to literally starve himself unless he wanted to eat steaks and chops at all times. I remember that when I was training for a match, I was so truly tired of steaks that I choked every time that I ate one but it was steak or nothing. I advise my men to diet at all times but it is perfectly possible for them to diet and, at the same time, to enjoy their food. My only 'don't' is the one regarding the eating of such combinations as fresh milk and cheese, and fruit with cream. In fact, I advocate the use of evaporated milk entirely. Vegetables are fine and the more that the athlete eats the better he will be for it. Pastry, of certain kinds, such as homemade pies, cakes and cookies, if made correctly, and with pure butter, evaporated milk and pure lard, are very beneficial. Stews and boils are ideal. Taken as a whole, any food, with a few exceptions, is all right if properly cooked and eaten without gorging."

And one has but to look at Howard, who is the most religious user of his own system, to realize that it is a success.

SMALLEST MOTOR TALL AS A DIME

Maker Spent Three Years in Manufacture.

Lincoln, Neb.—What its modeler insists is the smallest electric motor ever made is in the possession of E. Kahm, who has put in most of his spare moments for the last three years cutting out its parts and putting them together. It is now complete and running. The machinery run by the motor and the motor itself are mounted on a block of wood that is two and a half inches long and an inch and a half wide. The "belt" is made up of strands from No. 60 cotton thread. It makes 400 revolutions a minute.

The motor has 58 parts, made of gold, silver, copper, brass and iron and is on the conventional lines of standard motors. It is held together by 19 screws, the smallest of which has 200 threads and the largest 220 threads. Many of the parts, especially eight fiber washers and the binding posts, are so small that they cannot be seen by the naked eye. Kahm used a jeweler's glass while making the parts.

The motor is half as high as a 10-cent piece and weighs 100 grains. It took five feet of wire to wind the armature and three feet for each electric field, making a total of eleven feet. Kahm is a garage man and an expert electrician. This is the second miniature motor he has made, the first one being twice the size of this one. It was stolen during a fire, and was never recovered.

Kahm said that if he had charged for day labor at the customary price, the labor cost alone would have been $150.

Finds Music Best Means of Training Children

Philadelphia.—Music is the best means of gaining the understanding of children in all campaigns for Americanization, believes Mrs. Mary Louise Curtis Bok, who has spent many years working among the residents of Philadelphia's foreign quarters.

"We find music the best way to reach out for the sympathy of these young people," says Mrs. Bok. "While visiting the settlements I saw how many talented young musicians were compelled to give up a promising career because of poverty."

Her work in the music settlement schools of the city inspired Mrs. Bok to give a permanent endowment of $12,500,000 to the Curtis Institute of Music, founded three years ago to aid in the development of musical talent in America.

This fund is one of the largest ever devoted to this purpose. Josef Hofmann is the director. Funds are available for living expenses of needy students. Tuition, use of musical instruments and tickets for concerts and operas are offered, without cost. The institute also meets the cost of launching students upon their professional careers.

Among the teachers engaged by Mrs. Bok are Mme. Marcella Sembrich and Emilio de Gogorza, voice; Josef Hofmann and Moriz Rosenthal, piano, and Carl Flesch, violin.

Says Earth Will Cease to Rotate Eventually

London.—The earth eventually will cease to rotate and will become a stationary object, one-half with sunshine and the other half with eternal darkness, according to Dr. Andrew Crommelin, formerly assistant astronomer at the Royal observatory, who recently retired after 36 years of service.

Doctor Crommelin declared here recently that at the present rate of "slowing" in its rotation the earth would cease to rotate in some "few millions of years." He attributed the "slowing" to friction of the tides.

"The world is safe enough, however," he said, "so far as everyone who is on it now is concerned."

Referring to life on other planets and heavenly bodies, Doctor Crommelin declared so far as science knows at the present there is no life on the moon. "Life on the moon," he said, "would be impossible unless there is some animal there that can live without air."

Rat-Killing Record

Cardiff, Wales.—Claims to having killed 2,500 rats in eighteen months are laid by Charles Rees, an official at the Llanhilleth House colliery, near here. He used a Sealyham, a fox terrier and a ferret in his work.

Giant Magnet Clears Roadway of Nail Perils

Olympia, Wash.—New equipment for removing nails and metal matter from highways has just been perfected by the engineering department of the State College of Agriculture, at Pullman. It consists of a specially designed magnet built especially for road work. Each magnet is strong enough to pick up a loose nail a distance of six inches or more and in operation the magnet is carried about two inches off the road. It has in demonstration picked out nails buried two inches in the gravel or mashed into the tar divisions of the concrete. The equipment has four four-foot magnets sweeping a strip eight feet wide.

FIND AUDUBON BIRD PAINTINGS ON WALL

Priceless Art Treasures May Be Lost.

New York.—Hitherto undiscovered paintings of bird life by John James Audubon, world famous ornithologist and artist, who died in 1851, are believed to lie concealed beneath paint and dingy wall paper on the plaster walls of his old studio in the Audubon mansion at One Hundred and Fiftieth street and the Hudson river, it was learned recently.

James McGrath, a railroad worker, who occupies the first floor of the now rickety frame house and uses the former studio for a kitchen, uncovered the paintings several years ago. Having no idea of their origin or their value he covered them over and perhaps obliterated them forever with lead paint and wall paper.

McGrath, who has lived with his family in the old Audubon house for seventeen years, cheerfully admitted that he had painted out the scores of bird pictures and sketches which had adorned his kitchen walls.

Calls Them Right Pretty.

"Sure," he said, "I remember them well. Soon after we moved here I took off the dirty old wall paper in the kitchen—several layers of it—and underneath on the plaster were all kinds of bird pictures. Every sort of bird I ever saw and a whole lot I never saw, painted in all kinds of colors. There was a whole bunch of them and a bowl of fruit painted right there over the sink. They were right pretty.

"About two years ago, though, I got tired of looking at them, so I got a can of good lead paint with a little linseed mixed in and put a nice coat of paint all over the walls. A little later I got tired of the paint and put up that green wall paper. Those birds are dead now all right—flown away for good."

Alexander A. Kelly, an expert on the restoration of paintings, made an examination of the walls of the studio a few days ago. From such study of the plaster as he could make, where the wall paper was peeled or abraded, he concluded that the paint used by McGrath had aged to such a point that its removal might at the same time remove or deface the paintings beneath. Whether any recovery or restoration is possible cannot be learned without a thorough examination.

Reginald Bolton Pelham, whose grandfather was a close friend of Audubon, and who himself is a historian and an authority on Audubon's life, was questioned about the paintings.

"McGrath's statement checks exactly with what I have heard from my grandfather and with rumors which from time to time have come to me," Mr. Bolton said. "Audubon was fond, my grandfather said, of covering the walls of his studio with bird sketches, often as well executed as his best work. And I have heard that at the time of his death, through some unpardonable oversight, these sketches were papered over.

"I have often thought of trying to confirm the report, but have been unable to obtain further information. McGrath's own statement in the matter seems conclusive. If the pictures cannot be restored it is a tragedy."

Mansion to Be Destroyed.

The memory of Audubon is revered by thousands of bird lovers and naturalists throughout this country and abroad. The Audubon societies, the junior department of which alone is said to have several hundred thousand members, was organized in his honor in 1886. His drawings of birds in a complete series of life-sized colored figures, published in his "Birds in America" in 1838, marked an epoch in ornithology. Original copies of this work, in good condition, bring today thousands of dollars.

The Audubon mansion, nearly a century old, is doomed to destruction within a few months by the straightening of Riverside drive at One Hundred and Fifty-seventh street. Audubon park and "Garage Village" will be eliminated, and a series of modern apartment houses will rise upon the site.

Justice of King's Bench Ranks High in Dignity

London.—There are few positions of greater dignity in England than that of justice of the king's bench. When on circuit the justice is treated with the ceremony usually accorded to royalty. He is deemed the first man in the county, and the bells of the circuit tower ring and a bugle announces the opening of his assize court.

Yet the justice's salary has been at the same figure for nearly two centuries. When it was first set in the Eighteenth century at £5,000 a year, it was deemed a princely recompense, but with the decrease in the value of money and the present British income tax it is considered not so generous.

"Firemen, Save My Cow," Farmer's Call—They Did

Jefferson City, Mo.—The most unusual order the fire department has received came recently when Jim Roark telephoned:

"Come rescue my cow."

The department made a hasty run, expecting a fire at the big dairy barn, and found that the order had come in after the cow had become mired in the mud.

Only the cow's head and shoulders were showing above the mud. The animal was finally removed.

ANCIENT BURIAL CUSTOMS CITED

Excavations Near Wisconsin River Reveal Them.

Sheboygan, Wis.—Excavation of Indian mounds near Black river is under way at present, with archeologists from the Milwaukee museum and the Wisconsin Archeological society in charge of the work.

Study of the bones already unearthed shows that the Indians buried there are either of a tribe which did not use the "cradle board," or are of Indians who lived there before the method of carrying babies strapped to a board which was carried on the mother's back, came into general usage.

This last theory is most favored by the archeologists, for there are very few dishes and ornaments buried with the bodies, leading to the belief that the burials took place before the custom of placing such articles in the graves became common.

One of the mounds already excavated has revealed the skeleton of a body buried in the flesh, while another is that of a "pack" burial, where bones of others, previously dead, have been disinterred, bundled together, and buried with the body of another person.

The latter, it is thought, may have resulted when all but the head of a family died first, were buried and dug up again to be re-buried with the last of the group.

The mounds excavated so far are of the effigy type, being built in the shape of animals.

Police Take Kick Out of Limehouse Nights

London.—American tourists who come to London with an idea of finding adventure in "wild and woolly" Limehouse are doomed to disappointment.

That picturesque section of the London dock district is no longer the place Hollywood motion pictures portray. The Shanghai cafe, one of the last business establishments to sell Limehouse "atmosphere" to tourists, has nailed up its front door on Limehouse causeway and moved to Soho, where it can depend on a regular clientele for its chop suey.

Americans report to their tourist agencies that they are disgusted with the quiet evenings they have wasted in Limehouse looking for excitement. Coster boys with dirty necks and mufflers instead of collars and ties are the most picturesque things they see, and an evening spent in the neighborhood is as quiet as a Sunday school festival.

Those who hanker for "the good old days" when crimes were frequent should blame it on Inspector Hall, who has just retired from the criminal investigation department of Scotland Yard.

He is known as the man who cleaned up Limehouse. Ten years ago Inspector Hall took charge of the dock district. At that time Limehouse was infested with criminals of every nationality, and every street had its opium dens and white slave dives.

Lawyer Takes Client to Court in Airplane

St. Paul, Minn.—There are flying doctors, and the flying parsons are quite numerous, but a flying lawyer is somewhat of a novelty.

Second Lieut. Thomas M. Strickler of the One Hundred Ninth Aero squadron, an attorney, had a case at Olivia and decided to fly there with his client, T. G. Linnell, secretary of the Twin City Fire Insurance company.

So they hopped off and in 65 minutes landed at Olivia. In another 10 minutes they were in the courthouse.

Fifty minutes later the case had been tried, a verdict returned for the lawyer-pilot, and 70 minutes later they were back in the Twin Cities.

Western Washington Cow Establishes New Record

Tolt, Wash.—Again a cow from western Washington has established a world's record, Carnation Walker Hazelwood having been officially credited with producing in a seven days' test, 627 pounds of milk and 43.22 pounds of butter. This is the best production for three-year-olds in any week test. Last year this heifer broke the world's record for yearly production in the two-year-old class with 1,200 pounds of butterfat.

Tesla Sees Air Fleets Using Wireless Power

New York.—Nicola Tesla, inventor of the alternating system of power transmission, in an interview on his seventy-first birthday predicted that airplanes and airships would circle the world driven by light electric motors receiving their power by wireless transmission from generating stations on earth.

Power for manufacturing and for light and heat, he believes, will flow freely through the air from central generating stations to wherever it is needed.

"I have already demonstrated experimentally that I can transmit power by wireless half way around the earth without losing one-half of 1 per cent of it," he said.

A New Way to Make Jellies

Without Staining Fingers—Without Long Hours of Boiling—Without Depending Upon Berries or Fruit Being in Season.

One of the most interesting and yet one of the simplest new products in the food field is called minute jelly. It is pure fruit or berry juice already boiled down and concentrated. To this concentrated juice, fruit pectin in the right amount has been added. The pectin is that part of fruit which makes jelly "jell." It is as pure and wholesome as the fruit juice.

To make the jelly take the little bottle of concentrated juice, pour in a sauce pan, add water and sugar according to directions on the bottle and boil a few minutes. Then pour into jelly glasses and when it has become cold you have the most delicious pure fruit jelly you ever tasted.

A few bottles kept on hand, selected according to your taste for jellies, and you can make up a few glasses just as you want it. One small bottle makes two glasses of jelly. If you wish to try two bottles send us twenty-five cents and we will give you your choice of grape, mint, pineapple, orange, raspberry, strawberry or blackberry. Or four bottles—all different—for fifty cents. Address Department WU, General Packing Corp., Cranford, New Jersey.—Adv.

Epidemic's Big Toll

An estimate of the deaths caused by the influenza epidemic, 1918 and 1919, was made by Laumonier in the Gazette des Hospitaux, September 30 and October 2, 1919. He says that for the total of eleven months, allowing for analogous mortalities in Central Asia and the Far East, the world mortality could easily have exceeded 25,000,000.

The Biggest Little Paper In Marshall County

HOLT WEEKLY NEWS

Issued Weekly From The Home Of The Biggest Co-operative Creamery In Marshall County

One Dollar Fifty Per Year In Advance

H. O. Hanson, Publisher. Holt, Marshall County, Minnesota; Friday, August 19, 1927. Volume 17; Number 16.

Honor Roll

For May, 1927.

The following names are those of patrons who delivered 100 lbs. or more of butterfat to the local creamery during the month of May, 1927.

The last report I had published was incorrect, that is those that take monthly checks. In compiling my figures I had taken down the amounts they delivered for month of April instead of for month of May. Folling is correct report.

SORUM WILL BUILD LARGE NEW BRIDGE

Arthur Sorum, local bridge contractor, told a News reporter the other day that next week he expects to commence construction work on a new forty-foot span, all steel and concrete bridge over Middle River about 7 miles northwest of Newfolden.

Last year Arthur assisted his father, J. A. Sorum in building one of the finest steel and concrete bridges we have in this part of the county, when they spanned Thief River six miles east of Holt. Arthur has spent several years with the Minneapolis Bridge Co., and is well aquainted with the ins and outs of this kind of business.

Good Rain Fell Tuesday

A nice rain fell here on Tuesday which will help a lot in increasing the yeild of potatoes and late seeded grains. The big hay crop is now pretty well taken care of around here, most of it being put up the past three weeks during which time we have had some fine weather.

Now they are up in air about trying to find a good Republican to nominate at the next convention of this party to succeed our present President, Cal Coolidge who has announced that he does not wish to run in 1928.

We think that some of the boys here ought to get in line on this subject, they would at least have as much chance as some of the big fellows that have hopes of landing the job.

Shocking The Soil

New Electro-Plow Will Benefit the Farmer

Donald Woodward, at Leroy, N. Y., is experimenting with a plow that enriches the earth by plowing into it a high electrical voltage as the plow moves thru the field. Hamilton L. Roe, of Pittsburgh, who invented the plow, says that 103,000 volts of electricity that it carries, destroys weeds and harmful bacteria, while renewing the fertility of depleted farm lands and producing crops in record time. The tractor that pulls the plow generates electricity sent thru steel blades into the earth.

Many a farmer will be interested in the statement that the use of this plow in a buckwheat field freed the land of quack grass and weeds, the buckwheat seed germinated in eighty hours, and buckwheat plants grew twice as high as those in one half the field that was plowed without electricity, and fertilized with "200 pounds of fertilizer to the acre." When time and money are applied to industry, some of the farmers' troubles will vanish.—Ada Herald.

Threshing Already Started

The hum of the thresher was heard for the first time in 1927 near Warren last Tuesday when a small piece of oats raised on the O. H. Taralseth farm by Ed. J. Dvorak, was threshed by Soltis Bros., making it one of the earliest of threshing dates.

Youngster Breaks Leg

Last Friday morning while he was running about the house playing with some other small children, Roy, the young son of Mr. and Mrs. Hagberg had the misfortune to fall in such a manner that he broke his left leg above the knee and also threw the knee out of joint. He was taken to the Physicians Hospital at Thief River Falls where the doctors set the broken bones. At this writing he was getting along very nicely. He will be out of the hopital in another week or so.

The Green Cloak

STORY FROM THE START

Dr. Ronald McAlister, famous in his special work,—applied psychology—employs his leisure time in the elucidation of crime mysteries. As the narrative opens he is interested with Assistant District Attorney Ashton in the murder, in the small town of Oak Ridge, of a recluse, Henry Morban. The murdered man, his papers reveal, had been in New Zealand, where Doctor McAlister had lived in his youth. Will Harvey has testified he saw a woman wearing a green cloak in the Morgan home the night of the murder, Doctor Reinhardt, friend of McAlister, telephones he has a queer case in his hospital and invites McAlister to see the patient.

Her skin was very dark, a brownish-olive, her hair blue-black, very abundant and wavy, and the surrounding white of pillowcase, sheet and nightdress set off the richness and depth of her coloring to the greatest advantage.

Where the quality in her face lay that gave it that strange, weird, unearthly look, even now in quiet slumber, I could not decide. The features were bold, rather than fine; the brows and lashes very heavy, and the nose broad at the base, the lips full and rather wide, though not protruding, the cheek-bones high and prominent.

But this analysis left me no wiser than before; it failed utterly to account for that strange different look her face wore. There was no negro blood in her veins, even in a remote stage of dilution. The fact was as obvious as it was that she was not a Caucasian.

"There will be no trouble about identifying her," Doctor Reinhardt remarked, and I agreed with him, thinking that he referred to the strange quality of distinction I had noted about her face. But it was evident, the next moment, that he had some more definite mark in mind, for he took up one of the passive hands that lay upon the coverlid and started to strip back the sleeve of her nightdress. But the movement was arrested by an imperative gesture from Doctor McAlister.

Looking up at him, for the first time since we had stopped beside the girl's bed, I saw that his eyes were shining with an unaccountable excitement. He bent down over the pillow, his ear not six inches away from the half-parted lips. Then we saw that the lips were moving, and, in the suddenly enforced silence, caught the sound of a queer, droning chant. It only lasted a minute. Then, with the sudden, lazy motion of one deep asleep, she turned on her side, cuddled her cheek on her palm, and the chant died out in a sigh.

Doctor McAlister straightened up suddenly, walked away three or four paces, then wheeled and came back. Ashton and I watched him curiously.

"You started to show me her arm," he said to Doctor Reinhardt. "Is there a mark there?"

With a nod, he pulled up the sleeve and showed us, high on the forearm, a queer little bit of tattooing in red and blue. "I know something of tattooing," he said, "but that mark and the way it's executed puzzle me as much as her language does."

Doctor McAlister merely nodded. He had understood the language; I would almost have taken my oath to that, from the expression his face wore as he bent over her, listening. I wondered if he understood the mark, too.

"You say you've been trying to wake her, and haven't succeeded?"

"Yes, and I confess I'm puzzled, because there's nothing trancelike about her pulse or her respiration."

Doctor McAlister made an examination on his own account, but it was very swift, and I should have called it perfunctory, yet it was clear enough that this queer patient had, only a moment before, excited his keenest interest. But he did one thing which I think must have surprised Doctor Reinhardt as much as it did Ashton and me. He turned back the bed clothes and examined, rather minutely, the girl's feet.

"Well, I'm much obliged to you for bringing me out for a look at her," he said to Doctor Reinhardt, as he straightened up and prepared to leave the ward. "She's been that way, you say, ever since she was brought in?"

"Yes."

"She's in a hypnotic or subjective condition of some sort. I'd be very glad if you'd keep me informed, over the 'phone, concerning her condition. If there's any radical change, I'd like to come out and see her again."

"If you don't mind my suggesting it, I believe it would be a good thing to take her out of the ward and put her in a private room where she could be under constant supervision. If she says anything, in any intelligible language, it might be well to make a note of it."

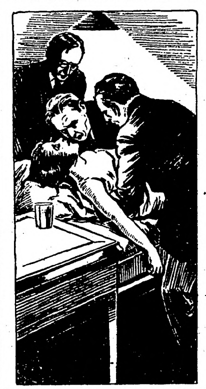
With that and a brief word of good night, he strode away, and Ashton and I followed him, he looking completely mystified, and I feeling scarcely less so. We drove back to The Meredith with hardly a word, but as we crossed the lobby on our way to the elevators, Doctor McAlister paused.

"Ashton," he said, "I will be glad to help you all I can—I mean in the matter of tracing Morgan's New Zealand connections. But I'm going to ask a favor of you. Give Phelps and me here a chance to make a little investigation of this case on our own account."

"Any thing you like," said Ashton heartily. "Go out to Oak Ridge and hunt about all you like. I'll even turn my impressionable Mr. Harvey over to you after I've finished with him tomorrow morning, though I can't guarantee there'll be much left of him."

We went up in the elevator together, and my chief, with a nod, indicated that he wanted me to come to his sitting room.

When the door was closed behind us, he filled his pipe and began striding, slowly, up and down the room. But he stopped before me at last, and with a preliminary "Hump," and a grasp of a muscular hand upon my shoulder he said:



He Bent Down Over the Pillow, His Ear Not Six Inches Away From the Half-Parted Lips.

"I suppose some people would call that a coincidence."

"Some connection, you mean, between the woman Will Harvey testified he saw and the one we saw lying there in the hospital?"

"Morgan lived in New Zealand, didn't he? And Ashton says he had maps, vast numbers of maps of the southern Pacific—large scale maps of the groups of islands that are scattered all through it. It's fair to suppose, then, that he had some reason for interest in those far-off South Sea islands."

"The girl!" I exclaimed. "The girl in the hospital!—Did you mean that she comes from that part of the world? From one of those islands in the South seas?"

"The mark on her arm is enough to prove that," he answered.

He paused there, but I knew that was not all.

"That queer mumbled song of hers?" I hazarded.

He took another turn across the room before he answered that question. "Yes, I understood it," he said at last. "That song, as you call it, was an old Maori death chant."

Doctor McAlister had resumed his thoughtful patrol of the room. "Of course," he said half under his breath, "it may be a coincidence, just that and nothing more."

"No," said I. "No, I can't believe that. There must be some stronger connection than mere chance, between the murdered body of that man in the house out at Oak Ridge and the death chant of that girl at whose bedside we stood tonight. It must be more than chance."

But my chief turned upon me sharply. "Don't make the mistake of thinking that," he said. "There is no greater source of error in the world than the belief that unlikely things can't happen. They happen every day, coincidences, against which the chances are a thousand to one. Still," he paused in his stride and plowed his hands through his thick gray hair—"still, to put it conservatively, it's vastly more likely than not that there is a connection; that this girl has some place in that unknown past of his, which he thought he had sponged out so completely."

"Well," said I, "if she was any place at all, isn't it altogether likely that she is the person who committed the murder? And if that's so—well, what are we going to do about it? Tell Ashton?"

He wheeled round at that and smote a near-by door panel with his great fist. "No, by thunder, no! Not that. Not, at least, until we've solved this mystery for ourselves; until we are sure we understand it. And I mean by that," he went on, looking at me fixedly, "I mean a good deal more than merely proving she was the woman whom Will Harvey swore he saw in silhouette upon the shade; until we've proved more than that it was her hands that pulled taut the catgut string around the old man's neck."

"What more than that," I asked unsteadily, "can you hope to prove, or want to prove?"

"This," he said, stopping before me and looking straight into my face; "this. That it was her will which directed the hands, and not her soul that was responsible for the crime."

"You mean," I gasped with sudden half-perception of his meaning, "that there may be another will concerned in the business?"

"Exactly that," he answered. "I mean that judging from that girl's condition tonight, it may very well be that the real murderer of that old man was no nearer to the house in Oak Ridge the night the murder was committed than we are now."

CHAPTER III

The next day Doctor McAlister and I each packed a handbag with enough to keep us going for two or three days, and about noon set out for Oak Ridge. The weather had been fine and rather mild for November, but shortly after our return from the hospital the night before, the wind had whipped round into the north. By morning it had developed into a lusty gale, which drove the fine stinging rain and sleet slantwise, down from a leaden sky. By the time we were ready to start, the rain was already turning to snow.

We rode in the half-filled smoking car, and hardly exchanged a word, until after we had pulled out from a tiny suburban station and the brakeman, opening the door amid a hail of cinders, had cried out: "Oak Ridge next." Then Doctor McAlister, who sat facing me, leaned forward.

"Our friend Ashton has a considerable power of vivid description," he said. "Unless I'm altogether mistaken, the young man who is setting three seats behind you, on the other side of the aisle, is the witness of whom he told us yesterday. I felt tolerably sure of it when my eye first lighted on him. He's going to get off at Oak Ridge, and I think that settles it. One small town could hardly boast another like him."

"How do you know he's going to get off at Oak Ridge?" I asked.

"He straightened up a little in his seat and began to readjust his necktie when the brakeman called the name of the town."

When I had made a pretext for changing over and sitting with the doctor, I quite agreed with his identification. There, to the life, was the young man whom Ashton had described to us. I thought I could see traces upon him of the grilling to which Ashton must have subjected him this morning. His eyes were sullen, his color unstable and his hands fidgety. I was half-inclined to think there might be something in the theory of Mallory, the detective, after all.

President in Power in Troublous Times

James Buchanan, as fifteenth President of the United States, occupied the White House when the questions of slavery and states rights were dangerously fermenting. His administration, from 1857 to 1861, saw the prelude to the Civil war.

Buchanan was born April 23, 1791. As a Pennsylvanian he disapproved of slavery, but being a strict constitutionalist and a Democrat, he held to official convictions. He publicly denied the right of secession, and refused to treat South Carolina representatives as foreign delegates.

His chief difficulty was an unsympathetic congress.

The Dred Scott decision and John Brown's raid on Harper's Ferry so stirred the nation during his administration that those events somewhat submerged his diplomatic accomplishments of settling the question of British dominion in Central America and by stopping Great Britain's "right of search" on American ships. The first Atlantic cable was laid in Buchanan's administration.

Before he died, June 1, 1868, Buchanan wrote his own vindication of his administrative policies.—Exchange.

FAMOUS MINING STRIKES

By THOMAS E. STEWARD

California Gulch

MANY a wagon that bore westward in the summer of 1858 bearing the legend, "Pike's Peak or Bust," was to be soon homeward bound the next year with the first brave slogan wiped off, and in its place the single word, "Busted."

But some of those who failed of success in that rush were of sterner stuff. They pressed on across the Colorado range and found gold-bearing gravel in South Park.

In the spring of 1860 some of these dauntless prospectors worked their way across the second range into the headwaters of the Arkansas river, from which many millions of dollars' worth of placer gold was destined to be washed.

No sooner had the first parties worked their way into this rich territory than gold strikes were reported in what was known as California Gulch. Slater, Currier, Rafferty, Stevens and Tabor were names among the earliest of those who found the coveted treasure.

The most astounding thing about the California Gulch strikes was the rapidity with which the news spread. Although the region was one of the wildest into which prospectors had yet ventured and almost no one had even traveled through the region prior to the strikes of 1860, seventy prospectors poured into the gulch within a few days after word of the discovery had gone out. By July 10,000 persons were in the camp, according to the estimate of S. F. Emmons, geologist in charge of the United States geological survey in 1885, who studied the history of the place. It was said that $2,000,000 worth of placer gold was taken out the first summer, though Emmons considered this an exaggeration.

The characteristics of a mining camp based on placer gold rather than on the more substantial "rock in place" type of diggings, which is to say, the true lode or vein, soon manifested themselves in California Gulch. Once the richest yield of the placer cradles had been extracted the population began to diminish swiftly. In three or four years' time, only hundreds remained where there had been thousands. Kellogg and other prospectors of the restless type sought newer fields. Tabor, settling down to the business of running the only store in the place, thereby put himself in the way of fortune, for it was a grubstake from that store that led to the discovery of the Fryer hill deposits in which was later to be Leadville.

Homestake and the Black Hills

THAT the rich gold deposits of the Black Hills in South Dakota should have remained practically untouched until after 1880 was due chiefly to the jealousy with which the Sioux Indians kept whites off the mammoth reservation that had been given them by the government under the treaty of 1858. This treaty guaranteed the Sioux against the encroachment of white men.

Stories of Black Hills gold originated in the tales told by a Belgian priest, Father De Smet, who lived with the Sioux in the first half of the Nineteenth century and reported many finds of nuggets.

In 1874 the government sent General Custer to make a military reconnoissance of the region, and he took with him Prof. N. H. Winchell, a famous geologist of the University of Minnesota, who later played a big part in the discovery of Minnesota's iron deposits. Gold was discovered by this party, and as a result of their reports a party of miners who thought themselves strong enough to fight off the Sioux, established themselves in a blockade on French creek. The government, however, lived up to its treaty and brought them out. But news of the gold strike had spread and the invasion of the Indian reservation now seemed inevitable.

In 1875 the government sent another party to prospect the Black Hills under strong military escort. This expedition confined its attentions chiefly to the southern part of the hills because of the dense forests that made the more northern areas practically inaccessible. It did not even reach the region of the Homestake mine. One of the geologists found abundant gold in the Whitewood and Deadwood gulches and described them as "the best place in the hills for a poor miner."

Much of the gold district of the northern Black Hills has been referred to as the "Homestake" without discrimination between a number of properties of which that particular mine is one. The Homestake and the Old Abe deposit, nearby, are said to have been located in 1876 by two French boys, Moses and Frederick Manuel. The Homestake property passed into the hands of a group of well known mining capitalists, among them J. B. Haggin and George Hearst, the father of William Randolph Hearst. The son is still a prominent owner in the property and its profits helped support his papers in their early days.

This mine is celebrated among geologists as one that has always been made to pay although the ore on which it is based is not of a particularly rich variety. The splendid technical skill with which operations have been carried on, however, has made it famous for its profits.

Being a Woman in Silk

(© by D. J. Walsh.)

WITH the dignity of an Elizabethan, a lovely silk-clad creature strolled with a leisure that denotes wealth into a department store that hummed with business like a beehive in June. The aristocrat observed with care various counters in the ladies' ready-to-wear and then carelessly picked up a garment from a table.

"She's evidently the daughter of a millionaire," observed the bit of humanity who stood on the other side of the counter.

"I'd like to purchase a gross of handkerchiefs," the fair customer said, "all of the same design. I am going 'slumming' and I think clean linen wouldn't be a bad gift for the poor who live in the depth of poverty."

The shop girl complied. Handkerchiefs by the dozens were brought out for the customer's inspection, but none seemed to fit her fancy. There was something wrong with all of them.

"I never cared for plain handkerchiefs," the lady in silk said. "I always prefer a design of some kind—adds a lot to the looks—don't you think?"

"But do you suppose the poor folks would really notice the design?" interposed the shop girl.

"Listen to me, little miss," snapped the silk-clad woman. "You shouldn't make such suggestions to your customers! It's your duty to wait on prospective buyers, and not make such remarks! Perhaps poor people of your mentality would not notice a piece of art! But I am glad to know that all of the lower strata of life are not of the class to which you evidently belong. A mere shop girl making a sarcastic remark to the daughter of a millionaire!"

The shop girl felt indignant, but said nothing. She, however, braced up and continued displaying handkerchiefs until her arms almost developed cramps. The task was hopeless. Practically every design of handkerchief in the establishment was displayed, but the beautiful creature could not be pleased.

"Perhaps it isn't handkerchiefs I want, after all," the lovely spoiled child of wealth asserted. "Show me something else. Let's see your stock of gloves."

The shop girl grew hot with the flame of anger. She almost lost control of her temper, but she remembered the promise made a few days before and subdued her feelings and forced a smile. Then she began on the glove stock. The story of the handkerchiefs was enacted again, but the aristocrat found nothing that pleased her.

"I'm sorry," she said indifferently as she walked away, "but really I am very choice, a bit hard to please. I'm afraid I'll have to try some other place. Nothing here seems to suit my rather highly developed taste!"

Then she left, while the shop girl turned up her nose in a fit of anger and intense hatred.

A half hour later the woman in silk climbed a winding staircase of one of the city's cheap rooming houses. She opened the door of her dingy one-room apartment and fell sobbing across the bed.

"Say, Lucy, what's the big idea?" questioned Rose, Lucy's roommate and sister in shopdom. "Why the sobs? Cheer up! I got a raise today and we'll celebrate by taking in a 'movie.' And why all the glad rags?" Lucy Graham (alias the woman in silk) wiped the tears from her eyes and smiled.

"But Rose, it was the greatest adventure of my life," Lucy said. "Of course, it was foolish of me spending all my savings for just one pretty silk dress and of losing the time. I told the floor manager over at the Emporium that I had a headache, so I laid off today, and sure pulled that 'rich-woman' stuff big on a little girl behind the lady's ready-to-wear counter at Kahn's. I tell you it sure is great stuff having the other fellow wait on you and treat you like you are a millionaire. It broke me flat, and you are gonna have to stake me till I get another pay day; but it was worth the price, being a woman in silk even for a day!"

In a palatial residence a millionaire's daughter went to her bed with aching arms and a lot of new ideas in her pretty head. The next evening she stood before the Sociology club and created a sensation by pointing out the dangers of aristocratic wealth crushing the poor of the land.

"My experience as a shop girl taught me a lot of things," the millionaire's daughter asserted. "I faithfully promised the department store head that I would observe the same rules and regulations as other shop girls, otherwise I would have soundly boxed the ears of one daughter of wealth!"

Telephones for Smyrna

An agreement was made between the city of Smyrna, Turkey, and the L. M. Ericsson company granting the Swedish concern a concession for 3[illegible] years for the installation and operation of a telephone service in Smyrna and the surrounding district. A special company with a capital of about $212,000 has been formed, with the city of Smyrna and the Ericsson company as shareholders. The first telephone station, which will be automatic, will begin with 2,000 lines, to be enlarged later to 10,000.

Honor Given Scottish Poet Somewhat Late

A memorial to Robert Ferguson, the Scottish poet, has been erected in the Moray aisle of St. Giles' cathedral, Scotland.

At present the only visible evidence that Ferguson lived and died in Edinburgh is to be found in the Canongate churchyard. It is the tombstone which Robert Burns erected 15 years after the death of the poet, to whom, on his own confession, he owed so much. Now, after 138 years, a memorial has been erected.

The memorial is the result of a contribution made by Hon. James Craigie, member of the legislative council of New Zealand. Doctor Macgillivray, R. S. A., king's sculptor for Scotland, made the model, which he had previously designed with such an object in view. The memorial has been erected under the auspices of the Burns federation.—Weekly Scotsman.

Lesson From Old Negro

An old negro taught a motorist a real lesson over near Auxvasse the other day, the Review says. The motorist crashed into a rickety wagon being driven by the negro. The man in the car started to speed on without reckoning of the damage he had done. He had gone only a short distance when there was a loud explosion and a tire went flat. The negro crawled from the wreckage of the wagon, and went over to the motorist.

"Boss, you seems t' be in a heap o' trouble. Kin Ah be uv enny help to yer?" The motorist wilted, took a billfold from his pocket and peeled off several bills. Handing them to the aged negro, he said, "Yes, old man, you have helped me; take this money."—Kansas City Star.

Test for Diamonds

A method by which the quality of diamonds can be definitely determined and imitations detected has been discovered by M. Malaval, chemical head of the police laboratory at Lyons, France, in collaboration with Professor Locard.

The stones are photographed under the light of ultra-violet rays filtered through a screen, sunlight being too diffused for the purpose.

Diamonds of the first water made a brilliant image, while inferior stones tinged with yellow make a fainter image on the photographic plate, and false stones are merely shadows.

Lots Like Jones

The death of Viscount Cowdray, the British oil magnate and contractor—he built the Pennsylvania railroad's Hudson river tunnels—led a New York oil man to say:

"Lord Cowdray had a humorous way with him. Once, when he was being criticized for his tunnel work by men who should have supported him, he laughed and said:

"'These men are like Jones. Jones, you know, would never stand by and see a friend abused. No, sir, he'd join in.'"

TWO HOMES MADE HAPPY

By Women Who Used Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

"I have taken Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and I think it is the most wonderful medicine I ever tried," is the statement made by Mrs. Goldie Shoup of St. Joseph, Illinois. She declares that after taking the Compound she is in better health than before.

Mrs. J. Storms of 29 Lane Street, Paterson, N. J., writes: "I cannot speak too highly of your medicine and I recommend it to all my friends."

These statements were taken from two enthusiastic letters which tell of the help that has been received from using the Vegetable Compound. Both Mrs. Shoup and Mrs. Storms were in a run-down condition which caused them much unhappiness. When women are suffering from lack of strength and from weakness, their own life and that of their family is affected. When they feel well and strong and are able to do their housework easily, happy homes are the result.

Are you on the Sunlit Road to Better Health?

Deadly Mushroom Is Enjoyed by Squirrel

Poisonous mushrooms seem to have no terrors for the lively red squirrel of the woods, according to Robert T. Hatt of the biology department of New York university. He noticed during his researches in the field that red squirrels fed freely on two poisonous species, and that they seemed to prefer them also when they came to store food for the winter. Incredulous, he tried mushroom diets on caged red squirrels, and found that they selected the same two species out of a variety of edible fungi offered to them. The poisonous mushrooms are the so-called fly agaric, Amanita muscaria, which is reputed to be almost invariably fatal to human beings and is sometimes used as a fly poison, and a reddish-colored species known as Russula emetica, which has a disagreeable peppery taste and if eaten raw will provoke violent vomiting. The reason for the immunity enjoyed by the squirrels is as great a riddle as their apparent preference for these two toxic species.

TEST CUTS DOWN NAVY DESERTIONS

Undesirable Type Is Kept Out of Service.

Washington.—Cutting down an alarming number of naval desertions by preventing the deserting type of sailor from ever enlisting in the first place is a new achievement of the United States navy. How this has been brought about, largely by means of a special psychology test, is announced by Commander D. E. Cummings, U. S. N., in an account to appear in the Personnel Journal.

In 1923, the number of men who were unable to adapt themselves to navy life had grown to excessive proportions, declares Commander Cummings. Almost one-third of the separations from the navy were desertions, and only 44.6 per cent left the navy by honorable discharge or transfer to the fleet reserve. Courts-martial were at the rate of 13,000 a year, with an enlisted force of 86,000 men. Altogether, a serious situation.

To find out whether general intelligence has any connection with the ability of a man to make good in the navy, the O'Rourke general classification test, prepared and stardarized by Dr. L. J. O'Rourke, now director of research of the United States civil service commission, was put into use.

Five hundred men who had deserted and been apprehended were first tested, and also 2,000 recruits. The scores of the deserters ranged consistently lower than those of the recruits in general. They showed that if men who made a score lower than 30 on the test were not allowed to enlist, 22 per cent of the deserters would be eliminated, and only a comparatively small percentage of men who might make good would be excluded. Further applications of the test confirmed the relation between low scores on this particular test and the likelihood of delinquencies and failure in naval life.

It was also found that men who had gone farther in school were more likely to make good in the navy than men who had had poorer educations. This is not surprising, Commander Cummings points out, considering that enlisted men are called upon to perform highly technical work, such as aligning turret guns, figuring ballastic corrections, handling radio communications and materials, and innumerable other things requiring greater intelligence, initiative, responsibility, and education than was required of sailors in former days.

Tests on recruits during the last year designed to show more definitely the relationships between delinquency and intelligence have not progressed very fast, owing to the fact that desertions and courts-martial have decreased so greatly, Commander Cummings reports.

Salt of Dead Sea May Become Revenue Source

Jerusalem.—Bahr Lut, or the Sea of Lot, known throughout the world as the Dead sea, is likely to become a source of vast income.

It has always been known that this gigantic lake, measuring in some parts as much as 1,300 feet deep, while in others no more than 12 feet, contains huge quantities of salt to such an extent that it is said that it is impossible to drown in it.

Now there is a strong rumor current here that the British government intends to grant a concession for the exploitation of these salts, the working of which, it is estimated, would bring in about $10,000,000 a year.

Such is the strength of the rumors that already land values are rising on the borders of Transjordania through which railroads would have to be built to transport the salt to Haifa to the north and Ukaba to the south.

At the same time the Arab executive here has asked the British government and the League of Nations that the exploitation of the Dead sea be left to the government of Palestine so that it may benefit the population.

Frog Eating Is Popular Among Japanese Epicures

Tokyo.—The bullfrog is crowding the reed bird and the snipe off the Japanese menu. Ten years ago a Japanese pioneer ate a bullfrog and pronounced it good. Five years ago enough Japanese were ordering frog legs a la king to make frog farming an inviting pastime.

Today almost everyone in Japan with the price selects bullfrog meat when ordering a fancy dinner, and there are more frog orders than bird orders.

Frog eaters are especially numerous in the warmer sections of Japan, where the croakers attain their greatest growth and are of the best flavor, but in all parts of the land enough of a demand exists to justify frog farms on a fairly large scale.

Engineer Travels Million Miles in Forty-Two Years

New York.—Peter Brennan, a locomotive engineer for the New York Central, retired on a pension a few days ago after having driven engines on the Central lines 42 years. He is seventy years old. In honor of his final day at work Brennan dressed the cab of his engine with numerous American flags.

Brennan lives in Yonkers, N. Y. Railroad men estimate that during his career he has traveled 1,000,000 miles on passenger and freight locomotives.

In recent years he has operated switching engines in the Harmon yards.

TASTE CONTROLS IMPORTS OF TEA

Examiner Uses Tongue to Determine Standards.

Washington.—America's $31,000,000 importation of tea is controlled by the tip of one human tongue.

The sovereign possessor is George F. Mitchell, supervising examiner of the United States tea control laboratory. It is his duty to determine by taste whether tea offered for import to this country meets federal standards for approximately 2,000 grades, kinds and varieties.

Directly under him are five men, one each at New York, Boston, Tacoma, San Francisco and Honolulu. Mitchell guides their work and standardizes their technic. Last year they brewed and tasted samples from 11,000,000 pounds of tea entering United States ports. Almost 500,000 pounds were rejected as inferior in quality. The remainder was ordered released from bonded warehouses.

Decision Comes Quickly.

It is only a few hours from the time tea shipments are docked until samples are tasted, approved for distribution to trade, or the importer notified of rejection.

Few persons possess such educated palates. Government tasters are selected after long years of training and experience. Usually "brought up" in the tea trade, they can tell blindfolded if they're tasting Darjeeling or Moyune, Foochow Oolong or Ping Suey.

They can tell by the taste whether the shipment contains artificial coloring or "facing," whether the exporter has sent the plant's tender top leaves, valued for the rich, stimulating alkaloid caffein, or the older stem leaves full of tannin and weak, noncommercial properties.

Can Even Tell Altitude.

They can tell, too, whether the tea grew at high altitudes, best in production of flavor, or the exact region in China, India, Japan and Formosa, Dutch East Indies, Java and Sumatra, Africa and the Azores.

If their tongues falter, if there is any doubt the flavor or the "body" is up to standard for that particular tea, samples are sent here to Mitchell. His analysis is final. A board of seven tea experts, appointed by the secretary of agriculture, has fixed uniform standards to guide him.

An adamant importer, insisting his tea is not below standard, has recourse to a board of tea appeals—three employees of the Department of Agriculture, whose palates are called upon to determine whether the tea in controversy conforms to their delineation of tea that is standard.

Grand Turk to Wed Girl Hunting for Work

Constantinople.—The Grand Turk is to take unto himself a wife. Not a surprising thing, one would say, for a follower of the polygamous prophet to do. Yet it is causing a lot of comment, particularly in view of the personality of the bride-apparent. Mustapha Kemal, the president of the Ottoman republic, recently met by chance at Broussa a Montenegrin who was in search of work and who was accompanied by his daughter, a girl of seventeen.

Struck by the extraordinary beauty and grace of this child of the Black mountain, Kemal sought her acquaintance, fell in love with her and asked for her hand and heart in marriage, offering to defray, meanwhile, the costs of providing her with an education befitting the exalted place which she will occupy as his wife. His proposal was accepted and Angora is now anticipating the nuptials. Incidentally the girl's father has been provided with a well-paying position.

Japanese Children to Send Flower Seeds for Dolls

Tokyo.—The children of the primary schools in the suburbs of Tokyo are collecting seeds of the Japanese gourd and of morning glory vines to be made up into packages and sent to the school children of America in acknowledgement of the receipt in Japan of the "friendship dolls" sent by American school children. With the seeds will go a message of hope and when the flowers bloom it will remind American children of the thanks of the boys and girls of Japan and of the friendship that exists on this side of the Pacific.

Excavators in Russia Uncover City of Dead

Kitchkass, Ukraine.—A hill in the neighborhood of Kitchkass, where a great hydraulic station is being constructed, has yielded what is declared to be the European counterpart of Karackoto, the "City of the Dead" discovered some years ago by the Russian explorer, Colonel Kozloff, in Mongolia.

Ancient tombs in which lie buried apparently important personages of the Bronze and Stone ages have been found, as well as numerous prehistoric caves containing relics.

Above are graves believed to belong to the Scythian period, and still higher, coffins of Huns of the Attilla period.

SKIN OF INDIAN BINDS OLD BOOK

Antique Is Treasured in Denver Library.

Denver, Colo.—Preserved in the skin of an Indian warrior, the "History of Christianity" is the most treasured antique in the archives of the Iliff school of theology of Denver university. The book, with its binding of human parchment, was once the possession of Gen. John Hunt Morgan, famous Confederate raider. It was published in 1752 and its text is in Latin.

By an ironic quirk of fate, the owner and binder of the book, one of the historic characters of the Civil war and the old West, is but a memory and his mortal remains are dust, while the skin of the Indian warrior, his enemy, is preserved and prized.

Clinging to the book is a history of lust for blood, of hate and revenge. But by that same twist in fate and combination of circumstances which reversed the intent of Morgan in binding the book, it now stands as a symbol of the doctrine of brotherly love.

The elements of hate were established when Morgan met the redskin in a desperate encounter. With knives and muscles they fought until, with a heart stab, Morgan killed the warrior.

Embittered by the struggle, Morgan had the skin of his enemy cut from his body. His revenge was in having it treated and bleached to form a cover for an old Latin book.

Morgan was no Latin student and the book he chose at random satirizes the whole affair. It was the "History of Christianity."

The skin of the Indian is well preserved. It has been bleached to banana color but is not broken nor cracked.

The book was presented by General Morgan himself to a Dr. William Barns, who in turn handed it down to his son, R. M. Barns, of Denver, according to an inscription in the book. On September 26, 1893, it was presented by R. M. Barns to the Iliff school of theology.

Indian Relics Reveal Early "Traveling Man"

Columbus, Ohio.—White men were not the first commercial travelers on this continent. They had predecessors among the Indians, according to the evidence of relics dug up in the ancient metropolis now known as the Hopewell mound group by Dr. H. C. Shetrone of the Ohio State Archeological and Historical society. Ornaments, utensils and objects used in religious ceremonies are found with the burials of this people that could not possibly have originated in their own limited territory but must have come from points as far away as the headwaters of the Missouri river and the Gulf of Mexico.

Conspicuous among the finds are large spearheads and knife blades of black obsidian; the nearest known deposit of which is in Yellowstone park. Large quantities of obsidian chips and flakes indicate that these weapons were not bought ready made but as blocks of the stone which were worked into shape after delivery. Eyeteeth of grizzly bears were also imported from the West. From the gulf region came large conch shells and long strings of beads made of tiny marine shells.

Though still in the Stone age culturally, the mound builders traded in metals. They brought copper nuggets from the Lake Superior region and galena, a lead-silver ore, from Illinois.

Turn Railroad Grade Into Unique Highway

Cashmere, Wash.—A unique highway soon to be in use is the 16-mile stretch of railroad grade abandoned by the Great Northern upon the completion of its eight-mile tunnel under the Cascade mountains. The right of way is 100 feet wide, well ballasted and ready for permanent paving, should it be necessary.

Once opened for the auto tourist it will be one of the finest pieces of mountain highway in the Northwest. From the extreme elevation of 4,500 feet, wonderful views of mountains and lakes are to be had. With the railroad buried in the mountains far beneath the highway there can be no danger of road-crossing accidents.

The new road will offer in the way of thrills and scenery the triple horseshoe bend, the double figure eight, seven openings of tunnels and six elevations of snow sheds—not missing the seven snow-capped mountain peaks visible from Berne station.

Berlin Firemen Free Entangled Swallow

Berlin.—The Berlin fire department, known in the jargon of the street as the "maid for everything," recently performed a stunt which would gladden the heart of any humane society official.

Pedestrians passing a coffee shop on Krausenstrasse, in the center of the business district, noticed that a swallow was caught by the wing in the eaves-moldings. All the bird's efforts to free itself were vain. Some one turned in a fire alarm.

The fire department, which has caught swarming bees, helped people who have forgotten their keys, and removed the debris after auto collisions, added a new page of honor to its record by restoring liberty to the frightened little swallow.

Guaranteed

"De Laval Cream Separators are guaranteed to be as represented and to fulfill all the claims made for them, being sold subject to the guarantee of their unequalled superiority in every material feature of separator practicability, inclusive of the production of a greater value of cream and of a greater quantity of butter of better quality than is possible through the use of any other separator or creaming system."

Skim the Skim-Milk

Ask us to bring out a De Laval and run your skim-milk through it. The new De Laval skims so clean that it certainly will recover any butter-fat you have been losing. Then you can tell exactly whether you have been losing or making money from your separator.

After checking up the honor roll list for June 1926 I find that this years June report has seven new names out of the first 10 on the list. We have names appearing almost at the head of the list that never used to be there. This is significant and it proves our small patrons of bygone days are now doing real dairying. I have in mind particularly Alf Movick. Alf is a gogetter and only unforseen happenings can hinder his success. Lars Hallesylt has always been a heavy patron but I doubt if he has ever been so close to the top of the list as he is this year. Iver Borsheim would have tied Lars for sixth place if he had laid off eating cream for breakfast one day. We have a real bunch of patrons and it is nice to work with patrons that are cooperators. I don't believe there ever was a time when things worked more harmoniously in the Holt creamery than they do today. Everyone of them is trying to bring better cream and with that spirit in the air I know we will close this years business with at least 10 to 15 per cent increase in our Land O' Lakes products. This is encouraging and I challenge most of the creameries in our district to show a better record in that respect.

Today the Holt Boys and Girls Calf club have their animals judged as well the Sewing club projects. The business men of Holt paid for a dinner giver in behalf of the club members, leaders and judges. Few of us realize the importance of the boys and girls club work, it is regrettable that every businessman in town din't close up shop and sit in with the boys and girls at this dinner. The trouble with most of us is that we do not really know what it means to the boys and girls say nothing about what it would mean in dollars and cents to the businessmen of Holt in time to come when these same boys and girls grow up to be men and women and take their parents place on the farm.

I admire the boys and girls that are members of this Holt boys and girls club. I hope that many more will join. Let me tell you that these boys and girls will not be satisfied with the cows that doesn't pay for their feed nor will the girls be satified with anything but the best kind of bread. It creates a desire to do better and it develops real men and women out of our boys and girls. I take off my hat to their leaders, Mrs. T. J. Taggart and Mr. W. F. McMurray. Let the businessmen of Holt as well as more of the parents awaken to what the boys and girls club work is going to mean to our community and to the success of their own children.

M. S. SAMPSON LOSES LIFE IN COLLISION

Bread Truck Crashes Into Car; Overturns It Into Ditch.

While driving home from Thief River Falls late Wendnesday night, Olaus Rodahl and Martin Sampson had a head-on collision with a big bread truck between here and Steiner. After the crash with the bread truck which is operated on this line by the Jungs Bakery at Thief River, Mr. Rodahl lost control of the Ford he was driving and turned over several times landing in the bottom of the big ditch on the west side of the highway, pinning Mr. Sampson under the car in about fifteen inches of water. The driver of the bread truck did not stop right away but he drove on to the section corner a half mile away and then turned around and went back to the scene of the accident.

In the meantime some other motorists had come along and assited Mr. Rodahl in tipping up the car so as to get Mr. Sampson out of the water but they were all to late as Mr. Sampson had been under water too long and was drowned. This is the second fatal accident that has happened on this piece of road, Mr. A. Austinson lost his life near town here a couple of years ago, when Florien Reiner of Jamestown, N. D., drove his car into Austinson's buggy with such a force that he fell out and died shortly after from a broken neck. Reiner who has been evading the law since March 1925, was placed under arrest at Jamestown recently and is now awaiting trial at the Marshall county jail.

Clarence Swan went down to Minneapolis last week to work.

Albert and Lydia Larson and Selma Kieson made a business trip to Middle River on Friday night.

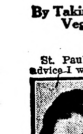
YOUNG WOMEN MAY KEEP WELL

By Taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Here is Proof



St. Paul, Minn.—"Here is a little advice I would like to have you put in the papers," Mrs. Jack Lorberter of 704 Dellwood Place wrote to the Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Company. "If young women want to keep their health and strength for the next thirty years of their lives, it is best to start in right now and take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I have tried the Compound myself and received fine results from its use." In describing her condition before taking the Compound, she writes, "I was afraid in my own house in broad daylight, I used to lock the doors and pull down the shades so that nobody could see me." One day a booklet advertising the Vegetable Compound was left on her porch and she read it through. In so doing, she found a letter from a woman whose condition was similar to her own. "I bought Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound," Mrs. Lorberter continued, "and have had fine results. My condition made me a burden to my husband. Now I ask him, "How is housekeeping?" and he says, "It is just like being in Heaven!" Are you on the Sunlit Road to Better Health?

FAMOUS MINING STRIKES

By THOMAS E. STEWARD

Diggings at Deadwood

THE financial panic of 1857 was a prime influence in bringing about the rush of prospectors into the hills of Colorado in that year which led to the discovery of many famous mines and resulted directly in the founding of Denver and Boulder, both in 1858, and of many minor settlements.

Business uncertainties resulting from the panic made many daring souls willing to risk their future in the Western wilderness in an effort to recoup losses in business. At about the same time a small amount of gold was collected and exhibited by a party of civilized Cherokee Indians, who said they had found it in the Colorado hills.

Early in 1858 a party of Georgians, headed by W. J. Russell, went into what was then called the Pike's Peak country in search of gold. They finally made a minor strike at the mouth of a gulch leading into the Platte river about seven miles below the present site of Denver, and when news of this find reached the outside world, the rush to Colorado began.

Clear Creek county, destined to become one of Colorado's richest mining districts, first yielded precious metal in April, 1859, when one George A. Jackson made a strike on what was called Chicago creek. That year was marked by an influx of prospectors who not only explored streams along the foothills of the Rockies but penetrated deeply into the mountains. The "Deadwood Diggings" were developed on South Boulder creek, and the history of Colorado as one of the nation's richest sources of metallic ore and metal had begun.

Discovery of the lode or actual vein from which placer gold previously found had been washed down, soon followed when John H. Gregory located what was called the Gregory lode, also in Clear Creek county. Several lodes were found near Georgetown, then known as Elizabethtown, and in 1860 gold diggings were located in the Upper Union or Empire district.

As a consequence of these discoveries and the inrush of population, congress passed a bill on February 26, 1861, organizing the territory of Colorado. Col. William Gilpin soon after was appointed the first territorial governor.

Settlement of the Colorado mining districts was accompanied by the usual riotous camp life, with many violent deaths, over-gay dance halls, and repeated instances of fortunes easily snatched from nature and as easily spun away across the gambling tables of the towns.

1849—The Marvelous Year

ABOUT a year after the discovery of gold at Sutter's mill, the gold of California began to attract the greatest influx of immigrants that America had known up to that time. People from all sections of Europe made their way overland, across Panama or around the "Horn" to join the bearded crowds of rough, gay, adventurous men and youths who were seeking fortune along the golden streams of that most westerly state.

The output of gold from the new diggings on the Feather, Yuba, American and Stanislaus rivers surpassed anything the world had known. Some miners, working with crude methods, made as much as $5,000 in a single day. When all the printers, and readers, too, of the Californian had gone off gold digging, the publisher decided to combine a tour of the gold camps with a little digging venture of his own. Upon his return, when he resumed publication, he reported that he had easily made from $44 to $150 a day with his pan, and had averaged about $100.

Gold dust became the currency of the period, but it was produced so rapidly that it dropped in price from $18 to about $4 an ounce and prices rose proportionately, as always happens when a currency depreciates.

Until the formation of the Vigilance committees there was no law but that of the fist, the pistol and the bowie knife.

These placer operations actually no more than scratched the surface of the placer and gravel gold deposits of California, but they came to yield as high as $50,000,000 a year in the period from 1850 to 1853. Then the output started to go down, due to the fact that many of the more easily worked diggings had been exhausted and machinery had not been devised that enabled the miners to work the deep and heavy gravel deposits.

The first of the placer tools was the pan, which a man held in his hand. He kept it under water until the heavier gravel had been washed away, then gradually let out the lighter stuff, while the gold sank to the bottom. When he had finished a pan he set its contents aside to dry, after which the light sand remaining was blown away and only the heavy gold dust remained. After the pan came the cradle or rocker, and it in turn gave way to a more scientific and larger rocker known as the "Long Tom." Eventually, when capital began to help in the development, "fluming" was introduced. In this process a flume or canal was built through which the entire flow of a stream was diverted so that the miners might work the gold bearing sand and gravel in the river bottom.

Cora's Cases in Storage

By DOROTHY DOUGLAS

(Copyright.)

CORA was in more or less of a quandary as to what was the best way of getting rid of the large cases that were accumulating in her small storage room. Once in a while she wished there were a man about the place.

She had watched boys, with their funny little homemade carts, collecting and splitting up boxes, left on the sidewalks.

"I suppose they make them into kindling," Cora mused and decided she had better hail one of these youngsters and offer him her cases. They were of a fairly decent thickness and no doubt the boys would be glad to cart them away.

Lamp shades, telephone covers, shoe boxes, cushions and things of that sort comprised the stock in trade of Cora's little shop.

"How much can I have them for, miss," asked the lad and Cora noted that he had removed his cap upon coming into the shop.

"Goodness, child, I don't want anything for them. You're doing me a good turn in taking them."

"My brother always gives me a quarter and says I must offer to pay for any especially good boxes I find."

"And what do you use the wood for?" asked Cora.

"My brother has a hobby for making things," announced the small boy proudly, "and he sells a lot of them and gives me the money. I have thirty-seven dollars in the bank now."

"Oh," exclaimed Cora vastly interested. "What 'things' does your brother make?"

"Candlesticks, boxes with birds on them, garden flower poles and even little tables and chairs—all from the wood I get for him. We work evenings after my lessons and—well—Tom's the finest brother in the world."

Cora was sure that she had never met anyone so delightfully naive as this small boy whose brother made "things."

"Tom and I live together and he gets all my meals 'cause he doesn't want me to eat just any old thing. We have a flat."

"I should just love to meet your brother," said Cora, and added swiftly, "perhaps he will let me see some of his wooden things before he sells them elsewhere. Do you think he would?"

"Sure he would," said Barry with much authority for so small a person. "And he'll make some pretty swell boxes out of this fine wood and some peachy bookshelves."

"I can see your bank account being a swell affair, too," laughed Cora and the boy joined in. From that moment they were fast friends and Barry promised to bring his big brother round and also to call for more cases in a day or two.

Cora watched him as he trundled his well-made cart off through the traffic, laden as it was with two large crates.

"I wouldn't mind working for a boy like that either," she told herself and hoped that big brother's handiwork would be good enough to display among her own wares.

Cora realized when, a few nights later, she met Tom Brentwood that he had not much play time in his life. He was serious, responsible and had much of the charm of his small brother.

"Barry told me all about you," he said when Cora invited the two into the shop. "And I'm so keen to help this young man along with a start in life that I've come right along to see what chances there are for selling some of my stuff."

"Do let me see it," said Cora enthusiastically. "I have a fairly good sale for oddments for the house. Oh! These shoe boxes for the fireside are lovely." She was quite astounded at the fine workmanship displayed in the slight collection he had brought. "These candlesticks, too, are quite unusual. You will let me sell them for Barry, won't you?" She turned toward the happy lad. "You see I want to help that bank account, too."

Tom colored slightly. "Barry's been telling secrets." He looked up frankly then at Cora. "I've been doing my best for him—you see we're quite alone in the world and it's a bit difficult to be father and mother. I've taken out a decent insurance policy for him in case he's left alone before he's old enough to look out for himself."

"Well," Cora said presently and her voice was softer than she knew. "I think I am going to help you and Barry a whole lot and I want to begin by asking you both to stay and keep me from being lonesome through my evening meal—besides, I'm rather proud of my cooking. You have a hobby for making 'things' out of old boxes and I have a hobby for making tasty food out of 'things.'"

"Oh, Tom, do let's stay—I should love to." He gazed hopefully up at his big brother. "I'll wash up afterward while you two talk."

Tom laughed and looked at Cora. He knew then and there that Barry had found a mother while he had found—love.

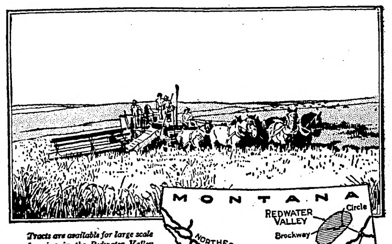
MONTANA'S RICH REDWATER VALLEY OPENED BY NEW RAIL LINE



Tracts are available for large scale farming in the Redwater Valley

Choice of 500,000 acres only $10 to $20 an acre

RAPID development of the great farming country in the Redwater Valley of Southeastern Montana is seen in the opening of 1,000,000 acres by a new branch line of the Northern Pacific Railway running 63 miles from Glendive.

Here the Northern Pacific will sell direct to farmers a half million acres, obtained from the U. S. Government, at prices ranging from only $10 to $20 an acre, with 20 years to pay. Taxes are extremely low—only 10 to 16 cents an acre. Special advantages are available to neighbors and colonies desiring to settle together.

Diversified or mixed farming is successful throughout this area. Corn has increased by hundreds of thousands of acres in the last few years in Southeastern Montana. Hog production has grown rapidly. All classes of livestock are raised. The dairy industry is getting a good start.

Communities already are established. Churches have been built. Schools are open. There is progress ahead. With the coming of the railroad markets will be closer. More farmers will come in. Land values will increase.

The Northern Pacific Railway will help farmers in getting started right. Settlers are wanted who seek a real chance for themselves and their families. The Northern Pacific will send a representative to talk the matter over, if desired. Investigate this opportunity. Let us send you booklets, prices and easy payment plan. All sent free.

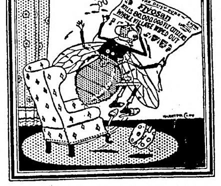
Flyosan still killing flies and mosquitoes by the millions



ARE you still fighting flies and mosquitoes by swatting them one at a time? Or do you use Flyosan—original and best liquid spray (non-poisonous)—which wipes them out by the wholesale?

Mosquitoes and the common house-fly, the deadliest pests that invade the home, are loaded with millions of disease germs.

"Swatting" them scatters these deadly germs into the air which you and your family breathe.

Flyosan floats through your rooms. It destroys all these germs as well as all the flies and mosquitoes which carry them.

Here is the right insecticide for each insect:

FLYOSAN, Liquid Spray—kills flies and mosquitoes.

PETERMAN'S ANT FOOD—exterminates ants.

PETERMAN'S DISCOVERY, Liquid—exterminates bed-bugs.

PETERMAN'S ROACH FOOD—exterminates that cockroach army.

PETERMAN'S MOTH FOOD — protects against moths.

You must have a specific insecticide for each insect. No single insecticide will exterminate them all. We have had nearly 50 years' experience. We know that is true.

The Green Cloak

STORY FROM THE START

Dr. Ronald McAlister, famous in his special work,—applied psychology—employs his leisure time in the elucidation of crime mysteries. As the narrative opens he is interested with Assistant District Attorney Ashton in the murder, in the small town of Oak Ridge, of a recluse, Henry Morgan. The murdered man, his papers reveal, had been in New Zealand, where Doctor McAlister had lived in his youth. Will Harvey has testified he saw a woman wearing a green cloak in the Morgan home the night of the murder. Doctor Reinhardt, friend of McAlister, telephones he has a queer case in his hospital and invites McAlister to see the patient. Doctor Reinhardt's patient proves to be a young woman, who in unconsciousness mutters in a language Reinhart does not understand. McAlister sees a possible connection between the murdered New Zealander and the girl.

Evidently Doctor McAlister had no share in this idea, for he lost interest in the young man the moment he was satisfied his identification of him had been correct. When the train stopped at Oak Ridge and we followed William Harvey out of the car, the doctor did not cast a single glance after his retreating figure.

By rare good fortune we found an auto pulled up beside the station platform waiting for the train, a flapping, dilapidated, mud-stained, ramshackle affair, with a driver to match.

After a moment or two of canny bargaining on the doctor's part, we found ourselves jolting along over a frozen, rutty road toward our destination.

"There's the house," said the driver at last. "But you're pretty late for the funeral, if that's what you've come for. It must be about over by this time."

Neither of us had thought of the funeral, and the sight of a hearse and a single car, waiting there in the wind-swept road, gave us, with our errand, a rather disagreeable sense of incongruity. That feeling was heightened when, leaving our bags in the hall, we were shown by the undertaker into a large, dim front parlor.

Here we saw death in its most conventional form. A little group of people sitting in rows in little folding chairs, a minister reading the service, a quartette from the village choir ready to sing another hymn when he should have done.

When, at the end of the service, the customary opportunity was offered for a last look at the body which lay there in its black casket, my companion rose and, nodding to me to follow him, took his place in the little procession that was filing round the coffin.

I could not do it; that act, somehow, seemed to put the crowning touch upon our intrusion.

"Oh, I know how you felt about it," said my chief when the service was over, the people gone and we were left alone in the old house—alone, that is, with the addition of Mallory. "I'm glad I haven't to go through it again, though I'm glad I did, even at some violence to what they call our better instincts. I wouldn't have missed my look into that face for a good deal."

"You didn't recognize" I cried. "He isn't anyone you knew, long ago, out there in New Zealand!"

"Not individually," said the doctor with a smile at my sudden excitement, at the sudden recession of those "better instincts" of mine. "Not individually, though that I might have was well within the possibilities. But he belongs to a type that I knew all too well. Did it ever occur to you to wonder why it is that full gray beards and spectacles are always regarded as infallible indications of benevolent respectability? But there's a scar beneath that gray beard that was not come by in any peaceful occupation; and even without it, the whole construction of the skull and jaw, the facial angle, the shape of the ears, all proclaim him a rough customer—the sort of man who might well have a past that he was vainly trying to escape from. No, upon the whole, I am glad that Ashton left us free to work out this problem without holding us responsible to him for our results."

Our conversation was interrupted there by the appearance of Mallory at the doctor's elbow. It was rather amusing to watch his face as he read the note from Ashton that the doctor handed him. It was easy to see, from his suppressed smile of contemptuous amusement, that the district attorney had represented us as a couple of harmless cranks who might safely be permitted to amuse themselves upon the scene of crime as they chose.

"All right," he said, folding up the note and thrusting it into his pocket. "Make yourselves at home. Do you plan to spend the night here?"

"Two or three nights, perhaps," said the doctor. "We want to do a little looking about."

"Well," said Mallory, with jocular sarcasm, "if you find the secret of the old man's past, or meet up with that mysterious woman that one of the witnesses testified about at the inquest, why, let me know."

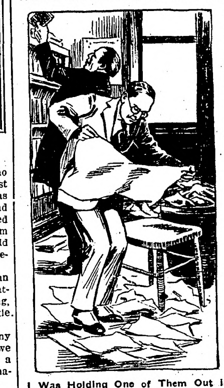
"You mean to spend the night here yourself, don't you?" I asked.

"Well, part of it, perhaps. I've got some looking about to do. But you needn't mind me. I've got a key and can let myself in at any time."

An hour later, after a bountiful but vilely cooked meal at a little restaurant near the railway station, we returned to the house and began our investigation in earnest.

The first room, of course, to attract our attention was the room where the murder took place, the study on the third floor. Across one end of the room ran a rude set of homemade shelves occupied, perhaps, by two or three hundred nondescript volumes. A very large, much-littered desk stood in the middle of the larger part of the room, while in the alcove was a high deal table of the sort used by draughtsmen. A stool stood before it, and a swivel chair in front of the desk.

In one of the numerous corners of the room was an immense hamper, which seemed to have served the purpose of a waste-paper basket. The detectives had evidently examined the contents of it in their search for a clue to the murdered man's identity, but had not thought the contents worth preserving. There was a litter of small scraps about it, and that was all. A rusty oil stove completed the tale of the furniture.



I Was Holding One of Them Out in My Hands and Poring Over It.

And then there were his maps. They were curiously disposed for a man who made a habit of geography. They lay about the floor in great rolls. The one or two I looked at, after my preliminary glance about the apartment, were of recent date and bore the stamp of the British board of trade.

I was holding one of them out in my hands and poring over it, wondering rather idly, what possible interest this group of tiny coral reefs could have had for a man who lived as Henry Morgan had lived, here in this village of Oak Ridge, when a sharp exclamation from Doctor McAlister drew my attention away from it.

He was standing close beside a big green-shaded lamp and bending over something which he had just taken from the top drawer of the desk. I shivered a little when I saw what it was, saw that it was a violin string.

The expression of the doctor's face, as he turned toward me, betrayed both indignation and excitement. "The prosecution of crime still goes on the basis that telling the truth is an easy thing to do; that a man does tell the truth, unless he means to lie. The man who came up here and found the body of Henry Morgan testified that he had been strangled by a noose. They thought it was true, because strangulation by a noose is the only kind they ever heard of. But look at this."

He held it out to me, and, my repugnance forgotten, I took it in hand. Instead of one knot, the string contained two, one near the end, the other about fifteen inches away. They were tied just alike, and were knots of the fixed-loop variety, very like a bowline.

"If there were only a knot at the end," said the doctor, "the rest of the string could have been drawn through it to form a noose; but, of course, with this second knot of equal size that becomes impossible. The man was strangled, not by a noose at all, but by a tourniquet—a little stick—a lead pencil perhaps—run through the two loops and twisted.

"Look here!" he cried the next moment, with rising excitement. "Here's the rest of the instrument."

He held out for my inspection a long straight-stemmed briar pipe, and I was able to see, just at the base of the bowl, a shiny, circular indentation. The ghastly clearness of the demonstration of the murderer's method sickened me a little, and I dropped the pipe rather quickly.

My chief was pacing up and down the room, talking to himself. "I never believed in that noose—not really believed in it."

"You are undoubtedly right about it," said I, "but is the discovery important? Does it make any real difference?"

"That depends on the point of view," said he. "To the late Henry Morgan, I suppose it made no difference at all. To an ethnologist, it makes all the difference in the world. The Caucasian uses the noose. With him it has been the instrument of execution, of murder and of suicide from time immemorial. But there are other races that never heard of it. The aborigines in my part of the world never did. With them it was always this." He caught up the string as he spoke, and jerked it taut in both hands. "It's the instrument of ceremonial murder. They used to send widows out of the world this way, until the British government put a stop to that etiquette."

Then, and only then, did I realize the importance of the discovery. "And the girl at the hospital?" I questioned. "Would those two loops be familiar to her?"

He nodded gravely. "I'll tell you this," said he, "I'm glad I'm under no obligation to report to Ashton until I'm ready."

Then he did a characteristic thing. He put the thing back in the drawer where he had found it, closed the drawer, straightened up, with a shrug of his broad shoulders, and said, in obviously good faith: "Come, let's begin."

Rather to my surprise, the doctor made straight for the waste-paper basket, growled a little at the "fools" who had emptied it, and patiently gathered together the few scraps that were left, some clinging in the interstices of the basket, some littered about the floor outside.

As I bent over to help him, he held out an irregular bit of thick white paper for my inspection. "He was a queer geographer, sure enough," was his comment. "He tore up his maps. This is part of one. There's a fact which might well have struck previous investigators as curious, but apparently did not. If he tore them up, it was because he was through with them. And if he could get through with them so that he could be sure he wouldn't want them any more, it was because they were meant to serve him some single, definite purpose. When they had so served it, or had failed to serve it, then he destroyed them to get them out of the way. That's logical, isn't it?"

"Absolutely, so far as I can see."

Presently he carried another scrap over to the draughting table, scrutinized its bare surface rather minutely, and then offered this second morsel of paper for my inspection.

"Well, that's one thing he did with his maps. He pinned them down on this table of his with thumb-tacks."

He pulled open a little drawer in the table, took out first some pencils, rulers and compasses, and finally a rectangular contrivance made of wooden rods, with flexible joints at the corners.

"Do you know what this is?" he asked. For a wonder I did, and he did not. That was a situation which arose but rarely.

"It's a pantograph," said I. "It's used for copying on an enlarged or reduced scale. You can set the scale to anything you like."

"That's what it means, then," said the doctor, turning away from the table, with a nod of satisfaction. "He spread his maps out here, and when they weren't on a large enough scale to suit him, he drew them up bigger, and then tore them up. No, that won't do. There's some intervening process. He needed those charts on a larger scale than he could get, and he enlarged them until they suited that unknown purpose of his. But of that purpose itself, we've found no trace. We may never find a trace, but if he's left a clew to it anywhere, I think we may hope to find it.

Kindness to Animals Trait of Portuguese

The Portuguese are the only Latin nation that is kind to animals. For hundreds of years noble Arabian steeds were raised here and the Portuguese rider sits well in the saddle by second nature.

The donkeys here are smaller than in other Latin countries, and the largest beast of burden is the ox. In Portugal this creature is a strong, red, well-cared for animal, with wide-spreading horns. The streets are full of yokes of oxen pulling carts with solid wheels bound fast to their axles. Since the axle is ungreased, a frightful squeaking announces the approach of these wagons, which can be heard a mile away.

Oxen are particularly common in northern Portugal, where the yokes themselves are made of beautifully carved hardwood decorated with many colors. The wheels of these wagons, bearing tremendous burdens, clatter on the streets of Oporto.

I have never seen a driver maltreat his animals. In the country the cowherds guide their flocks with enormous bamboo staffs.—Roda Roda in Uhu, Berlin (Living Age).

South as Political Unit

The expression "Solid South" was first used by Col. John S. Mosby in a letter to the New York Herald advocating the election of Rutherford B. Hayes in 1876, according to Liberty.

Children of civilized races have probably always had rickets, says a child specialist.

A pack of playing cards is used to seat Bangor (Maine) Rotarians at their regular Tuesday noon luncheon. Each table, seating six, is designated by a card, as "king table," "queen table," and so on. As the members enter each one receives a card from a well-shuffled pack. His seat is at the table represented by the card. The result is that it is not often that the same six are grouped at the same table on successive meetings.

Lake Bottom Settlers Will Be Reimbursed

W. J. Hannah, inspector for the federal land office, has finished the appraisal of the improvements on the Mud Lake bottoms in Marshall county, and has returned a valuation of approximately $60,000, according to Martin Widsten of Crookston.

The United States supreme court has held that the drained lands belong to the raparian owners, that is the owners of the shore line, and provisions are being made to re-imburse the settlers on the bottoms for the improvements they had made.

Mattsons to Crookston

M. O. Mattson and family moved to Crookston last week, where they have purchased a grocery store. They have spent many years here farming and last year sold out their livestock and machinery and moved to town, where they have resided about a year, during which time Mr. Mattson was manager of the Hanson & Barzen elevator.

Their many friends wish them success and happiness in their new home.

The War Is Now On

The board of county commissioners conducted a hearing at Warren last Tuesday afternoon on a petition signed by residents of Holt and Newfolden townships asking for a new ditch which is to start one mile north of here running in a northwest direction thru the two townships and emptying into Middle River near Newfolden.

Silas Torgerson, Axel J. Lundquist and Ole Hjelle were appointed as viewer in the project. When benefits and damages have been assessed another hearing will be held.

It has been reported that some fellows in the western part of the county, (not deriving any direct benefit from this ditch) are putting up a holler that if the new ditch is dug, they will be subject to floods in the spring of the year. Some of those birds that are always crowing so loud should come here in the spring and try some of the roads that the people who are asking for a ditch here use: then and not before would they realize that they are always getting the long end of things out west, and that they ought to show some cooperation instead of oppositon in this new ditch project.

The Argyle Banner says they question the advisability of endangering the land toward the mouth of the river in order to be of more or less questionable benefit to land farther up the stream.

We say that the farmers here have just as good land as those near Argyle and need protection against floods to their land as well as that out west, which a lot of is used to grow sow thistle on.

School Activities

R. J. Vieths, superintendent of schools here, arrived Friday by car from his home at Red Wing, to make preparations for the opening of the school term on Tuesday, Sept. 6.

The Local Curriculum

The following subjects, which have been recommended by the State Board of Education, will be taught in the local high school:

English I, English II, English III, American History, Ancient History, Latin II, Algebra, Geometry, General Science, and Physics.

The big argument as to who are to be bus drivers and janitor for the Holt school was settled last week, and now everything seems to hum right along. Although he did not have a bid in for the janitor job, Joe Nelson was hired by the school board to be janitor.

C. O. Johnson on the Ramaley Farm east of town was awarded the bus hauling job on the route going out as far as S. H. Nohre's place. Melvin Nohre was the lowest bidder on the route north of town, and P. N. Pederson acquired the route on the ridge southwest of town. This was the route over which there was some dispute. After a close study of the situation and much consideration, the board decided that Mr. Pederson had better take it this year.

School Begins Next Tuesday

The local school will open its doors to the children of this village and vicinity next Tuesday. It is urged that all those whom wish to enroll in the high school classes be present the first day in order to get lined up for the semester. An increase above the number attending our school last year is expected in both the high school and lower grades for the 1927-18 term.

The faculty will be the same as last year with the exception of Miss Annette Lano of Annandale, Minn., who resigned her possition recently. Her place on the local teaching staff will be filled by Miss Dorothy Collins of Minneapolis.

The GREEN CLOAK

By YORKE DAVIS

WNU Service.

STORY FROM THE START

Dr. Ronald McAlister, famous in his special work,—applied psychology—employs his leisure time in the elucidation of crime mysteries. As the narrative opens he is interested with Assistant District Attorney Ashton in the murder, in the small town of Oak Ridge, of a recluse, Henry Morgan. The murdered man, his papers reveal, had been in New Zealand, where Doctor McAlister had lived in his youth. Will Harvey has testified he saw a woman wearing a green cloak in the Morgan home the night of the murder. Doctor Reinhardt, friend of McAlister, telephones he has a queer case in his hospital and invites McAlister to see the patient. The doctor sees a possible connection between the murdered New Zealander and the girl. McAlister and his friend go through Morgan's papers. An immense collection of maps interests them. The doctor finds a noose and a pipe, used as a tourniquet, the instrument of the killing.

"There must have been some standard, some test that he tried those coast lines by. When they did not fit it, he destroyed them. That test or standard may have existed solely in his memory. If not, if it was a thing committed to paper, then we can find it. Whatever it was, he must have been in the habit of referring to it constantly. In that case, I have no doubt that it's somewhere in this room. Take the lamp and hold it at the other end of the bookshelves—so. Now raise it so that the light will fall horizontally along the top shelf."

He had stationed himself at the opposite end from where I stood, and he sighted along the projecting edge of the shelf as I raised the lamp to the height he indicated.

"Try the next one," he said, "—so. And now the next. There; that'll do. We've got it, if I'm not mistaken."

He walked over toward my end of the case and pulled a book out of the third shelf.

"Our thanks are due to the old woman for not being too good a housekeeper," he observed in comment. "The dust on those books is evidence enough that he was not in the habit of reading them. But this one shows a clear track in and out of the shelf. There's no better hiding place for a sheet of paper than a book."

He balanced the book carefully in both hands, and then let it open where it would.

"Well," he said, "I think we've found it," for there between the two yellow pages was a bluish sheet of semi-transparent paper, folded.

He laid down the book and opened up the paper. It was a map, too, and as I looked at it closely, I saw that it was executed on a very large scale. It was a map of a very narrow-necked peninsula. The soundings in the sea all about it were indicated frequently. Over the surface of the land itself were various little numerals, which had their explanation in a legend in the corner. One had only to read a little way down this explanatory column to see with what minute care the map had been drawn, and on how large a scale. Such unimportant objects, from a geographer's point of view, as a granite bowlder or a blasted tree had their position indicated.

No, the purpose of that map-maker had not been purely geographical. So much was clear.

"It's a tracing, you see," Doctor McAlister observed. "He's got the original locked away somewhere, now. But, do you notice, there's nothing on the sheet, anywhere, to indicate in what part of the world this bit of land lies? There's no latitude or longitude indicated. We'll have to get the original to find that."

At that, the explanation of the whole mystery of this wilderness of maps flashed across my mind.

"No," I cried, "he hasn't got latitude or longitude on the original, either! He never knew, to the day of his death, any better than we know now, into what sea that little peninsula juts its head. That's what he spent the last three years of his life hunting for."

Doctor McAlister nodded gravely. "You are quite right," he said; "right beyond a doubt. There's no knowing what there is to be found on that bit of headland, but whatever it is, he wanted it badly."

It was natural that we should both fall silent just then, natural, too, that in our excitement over the discovery, our nerves were higher strung than usual. It had grown pretty late. There was a dead stillness within the house. The only sound, save the ticking of a clock, that came to our ears was the occasional moan of a gust of wind through the trees and around the corners of the house. So it was natural that we both started violently when a gust of wind blew open one of the windows, with a bang, and caused our lamp to flicker and then go out.

I laughed nervously, and wiped my forehead with the back of my hand. It was wet. Then I rose, or rather, started to rise, and spoke at the same time—began to speak, at any rate. What I had in mind to say was, that I would close the window if the doctor would relight the lamp.

But before I had said three words, the compelling grip of his muscular hand thrust me back into my chair, and my sentence trailed off into a sort of gasp.

So, for a moment, we sat breathless.

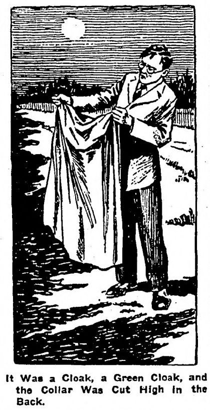
"Somebody's getting in," I whispered presently. "It must be Mallory."

"Mallory has a key," he retorted. "Listen—"

No, that was not Mallory. It was not anybody trying to get in, for somebody had already succeeded—somebody who was already making his way, with swift, almost incredibly stealthy steps, up the stairs from the second floor to the room where we were sitting.

We drew back into an obscure corner and stood close together, half-crouching, eyeing the door.

Presently we saw it opening. And then there emerged from its shadow a face we both knew—a face neither of us is ever likely to forget. The eyes in that face we had never seen before, for they had been closed the last time we looked at it. Now they were about all we could see. The black hair lost itself in the shadow which enveloped the doorway, and the olive-brown skin was itself a shadow. But the eyes—they burned with the flaming green intensity of a leopard's.



It Was a Cloak, a Green Cloak, and the Collar Was Cut High in the Back.

The doctor and I shrank back into our corner and waited, breathlessly, to see what she would do. The first thing was curious, and little to be expected. She closed behind her the door by which she had entered. Then, with brisk certainty, but with no noise at all, she moved toward the desk. That brought her a little nearer us.

She had got within arm's reach of the swivel chair, when suddenly, like a flash, all the motion of her body was arrested. Her attitude had something of the frozen alertness that one sees in a setter dog when he points game. We could see her face better now; it was turned squarely toward us. But, apparently, she did not see us. That was natural, for we were deep in the shadow. But she knew we were there. The next moment I perceived that she knew by virtue of the same sense that the setter uses. She had caught our scent. Her head went back a little, her nostrils dilated, and she seemed to be drawing in a deep breath.

I have no command of English to describe the suddenness and unexpectedness of the thing that happened then. She stood there before us, as I have said, like one frozen, so still was she. And then, with no preliminary motion whatever, no crouch, no visible gathering up of the forces for a spring, she flashed across the room toward the open window, like a dancing shadow. For just an instant I saw her etched in profile as she poised upon the sill. And then she was gone.

I had followed her to the window as swiftly as my clumsy, human motions would permit, and looked down, expecting to see her lying bruised and broken on the frozen ground. Instead of that, I saw the fleeting shadow of her moving swiftly across the snowy lawn toward the gate.

A moment later, bare-headed, bare-handed, I was running at top speed down the rough, frozen country road in the direction I had seen her take.

Before I had gone fifty yards, I heard other footsteps pounding along behind me, and a momentary fear that my old chief had been reckless enough to risk his bones in such a chase caused me to pause and turn back. It was not Doctor McAlister, however, but the detective, Mallory, and as he panted up alongside me, he said:

"I saw her coming down the rain pipe. She might almost as well have fallen, she came down so fast. What was she like? I don't suppose you got anything of a look at her, though."

"No," said I. "The wind had just blown out the lamp, and we were there in the dark when she came in."

"It doesn't matter," he said briefly as we plowed along, side by side. "I'll know what she's like well enough when I come up with her. But there is no use in your keeping up the chase. I'll get her alone, never fear. Nothing that wears skirts can outrun me."

I was already half inclined to take his advice and turn back, for the pace was beginning to tell on me, when I tripped over something and fell headlong.

By the time I had picked myself up and shaken some of the loose snow out of my sleeves, he was already a hundred yards ahead down the road. I was about spent, so, regretfully, I turned back.

But for one moment I passed curiously to investigate the cause of my fall. It had been something soft, something that gave a little as my foot struck it, and then clung. It had been entirely covered by the snow, which had fallen out here in the country to a depth of nearly six inches.

I scuffled around in it with my feet until I found it. Then I stooped and picked it up. It must be a shawl or a blanket, I thought, as I shook the snow out of its folds and held it out in both hands. No, it was neither. It was a cloak; a green cloak, and the collar was cut high in the back.

I cast a glance over my shoulder. Mallory was already out of sight in the distance. I threw the cloak over my arm and trudged back to the house.

CHAPTER IV

Early the next morning Doctor McAlister and I took one of the trains upon which the male population of Oak Ridge habitually goes to town upon its several and various business. We had by no means exhausted the possibilities of discovery which still lay concealed, we felt sure, within that lonely old house where we had passed so strange a night; nor had we solved its mystery. But matters of a more instant importance compelled us, for a while, to abandon it.

In the first place, we knew that, little as we liked the prospect, it was our clear duty to report to Ashton what we knew of the mysterious, wild creature who had escaped from the hospital and was now at large. By one means or another, she must be found as quickly as possible. She had already destroyed one life—of that we were practically sure—and until she was safely under restraint again, we could have no guaranty that she would not destroy others. To thwart that possibility, we must call in Ashton and the police, however little to our liking such a course might be.

We deferred our breakfast until our arrival in town, memories of the dinner we had had the night before making it easy to go hungry for a while. We were later getting in than we expected to be, for a combination of fog and freezing sleet delayed our train. Out of the car windows we could see as we crawled along, that the telegraph wires were already sagging under their white armor of ice. As soon as we got in, we drove straight to The Meredith.

In the restaurant we found Ashton himself, just sitting down to breakfast. He welcomed us with an eagerness that showed that he had already heard some report of our adventure of the night before.

Cats Alike Fond of Traveling and Home

The glare of limelight that recently beat upon Fluffy, the London Victoria station cat, who boards the 10:45 train to Dover every morning, lunches upon nice creamy milk at the buffet there, and returns to town by the afternoon train, is a reminder of a curious fact about cats; they are at once the greatest travelers and the greatest "home bodies" of all domesticated animals.

Other cats in England, and, indeed, in most countries, regularly journey long distances on trains, usually in the restaurant car, but sometimes with the train crew. As for seafaring cats, there must be hundreds of thousands of them, from North cape to the Horn, Southampton water to Nagasaki bay. Most liners carry quite a number; there are White Star vessels with five-and-twenty aboard. There was an amusing incident not long ago when one of the Adriatic's cats, that had failed to turn up when the ship sailed, reappeared for the next voyage with its tail proudly waving in the breeze and five little kittens trotting along behind.—Manchester Guardian.

BLONDS SCARCE, SO SAYS EXPERT

That's the Reason Gentlemen Prefer Them.

Chicago.—The reason why gentlemen prefer blonds is that there are more dark than light-haired women in the world.

For every golden-locked preference, Mrs. Ruth J. Maurer, beauty expert, says there are nine dusky-haired second choices.

"Gentlemen prefer blonds," observed Mrs. Maurer, whose experiences of the past twenty years have brought her into contact with 50,000 blonds, brunettes and red heads, "because they are hard to find. Dark-haired women, according to beauty statistics, outnumber them ten to one.

"Another reason why men like them better is that masculine eyes focus like moving picture lenses. Blonds 'take' better than brunettes. Light hair and eyes illuminate the human retina just as they do the silver screen.

"Blonds, though, aren't like blonds. They are blue blonds or pale pink blonds or strawberry, peach, ash, gold or red blonds. There are 18 distinct shades of hair among the people of the white race. There are also 18 different colored eyes. There are 12 independent complexions.

"A pale pink blond usually has a delicate strawberry complexion and China blue or moss-green eyes. A blue blond as a rule possesses an almond skin and occasionally dark hazel or light brown eyes. An ash blond is drab with chrome or light blue eyes.

"The scarcity of pure blonds accounts for the popularity of the peroxide bottle over the dye pot. Proportionately there are a greater number of bleached blonds than dyed-in-the-hair brunettes.

"The typical American girl is a brunette, a warm brunette, with peach skin and hazel or medium brown eyes."

Tired of Liver Diet? Apricots Just as Good

Rochester, N. Y.—Anemics who have had to eat liver until they revolted at the word itself may obtain a little variety with apricots, peaches and prunes. Recently experiments at the University of Rochester medical school by Drs. G. H. Whipple and F. S. Robscheit-Robbins indicate that, although liver and kidney are by far the most potent food materials for the regeneration of the red blood corpuscles, certain other animal organs and several fruits are also effective, and hence can be used to vary the diet in anemia.

A long-debated question in medicine is whether iron must be in organic combination before it can be utilized by the body in regenerating the iron-containing hemoglobin, or whether a simple inorganic salt of iron, such as ferrous carbonate, will suffice. Apparently the form of iron and the quantity in which it occurs are not the deciding factors.

Beef kidney contains three times as much iron as does beef liver, but the latter is far more effective in blood regeneration. Raspberries contain more iron than do apricots and peaches, but are inert in blood regeneration. There is certain evidence that some unknown substance is supplied by the effective foods, and that it enables the body to utilize the iron.

Science Hunts Cause of Knocks in Motor

State College, Pa.—The secrets of the automobile engine in hiding the real causes of its "knock," may yield before the searching investigations of science, if coming developments in the study of these problems prove as successful as preliminary observations.

What happens in the cylinder of the engine can be shown by means of a spectroscope, an instrument for making and measuring artificial rainbows, said Dr. Emma P. Carr of Mount Holyoke college before the institute of chemistry of the American Chemical society.

"The spectra, or rays, given by these artificial rainbows show the nature of the materials present in the cylinder of the engine," Miss Carr explained. "The spectra of detonation, explosion and combustion show decided differences in structure and give us some indication of the chemical changes taking place."

Czarist Admiral Now "Man Without a Country"

Cleveland, Ohio.—Andrew Pukit, fifty-three years old, a former admiral in the czar's navy, found himself a "man without a country" when he faced immigration officials here on a charge of failing to report his entrance into the United States.

Pukit was arrested at the home of his daughter here, where he has lived for a year after entering the United States in 1923, when he was forced to flee from Russia because of his anti-bolshevist convictions. A graduate of the Imperial Navy academy, Pukit saw service in the Russo-Japanese, Chinese Boxer and World wars.

He took out his first citizenship papers in the United States a year ago, but his status is uncertain.

What's the Answer?

New York.—The United States Department of Labor has been called upon to rule whether all musicians are artists or some merely "laborers in the field of music."

BIRTHPLACE OF HYMN MARKED BY TABLET

History of "He Leadeth Me" Told by Author.

Philadelphia.—A bronze tablet has been placed by the United Gas Improvement company on its new building here as a permanent marker of the birthplace of the hymn "He Leadeth Me," and the historic fact that the First Baptist church once stood on the present site of the company's building. The tablet was erected on the Arch street side of the building. It bears date of June 1, 1926, erection having been delayed by the building of the new structure and the construction of the subway.

Information that paved the way for the erection of the tablet was given two years ago by the late Rev. Dr. John Gordon, a Baptist clergyman who pointed to a brownstone dwelling at 1409 Arch street, adjoining the new building, and said: "That old dwelling has a remarkable history; a wonderful hymn, 'He Leadeth Me,' was written there. The Rev. Dr. Gilmore wrote it way back in the '60s. The hymn has been sung all over the world."

Words Set to Music.

Dr. Gilmore, in his own account of the writing of the hymn, said:

"As a young man I was supplying for a couple of Sundays the pulpit of the First Baptist church in Philadelphia. At the midweek service—on the twenty-sixth of March, 1861—I set out to give the people an exposition of the twenty-third Psalm, which I had given before on three or four occasions; but this time I did not get further than the words, 'He leadeth me.' Those words took hold of me as they had never done before. I saw in them a significance and beauty of which I had never dreamed.

"At the close of the meeting a few of us kept on talking about the thought I had emphasized; and then and there, on a blank page of the brief from which I had intended to speak, I pencilled the hymn, handed it to my wife and thought no more about it.

"It occurred to her months afterward to send the hymn to a paper published in Boston, where it was printed. It attracted the attention of William B. Bradbury, who slightly modified the refrain and set the hymn to the music which has done so much to promote its popularity.

Hears His Hymn Sung.

"I did not know until 1865 that my hymn had been set to music. I went to Rochester to preach as a candidate before the Second Baptist church. Going into their chapel on the day that I reached the city, I took up a hymnal to see what they sang, and opened it at my own hymn, 'He Leadeth Me.' I accepted it as an indication of divine guidance, and have no doubt I was right."

Joseph H. Gilmore was born in Boston, April 29, 1834, the son of Joseph Albree Gilmore, governor of New Hampshire from 1863 to 1865. He was educated at Phillips-Andover academy, Brown university, and Newton Theological seminary.

Professor Gilmore taught at Newton one year and then became pastor of the Baptist church at Fisherville, N. H. He was called to the Second Baptist church of Rochester in 1865 and occupied the pulpit for two years. He was then appointed to the chair of English language and literature at the University of Rochester. He retired in 1908 after more than 40 years of service.

3,000 More Varieties of Roses in 20 Years

London.—Horticulturists of England have much more to contend with in the way of selecting flowers than they had several years ago.

Statistics just issued show there are 3,000 more different kinds of roses than there were 20 years ago. In the same time the gladioli have risen from 2,000 varieties to 12,000. In 1907 there were only 1,500 sorts of dahlias, whereas there now are 8,000.

Research in poultry nutrition, prevention, extension of the industry and marketing of fowls were discussed in sessions held by various divisions of the congress.

Whole Family Has Tails Like Beasts'

Sydney, Australia.—Reports of a family in which every member except the mother possesses a perfect tail, which, in the case of the father, can be wagged like a dog's, has excited the interests of medical men here.

The father, a ten-year-old son and two daughters, three and six, have tails. The grandparents of the children were normal, and the father and the children are normal except for the tails which grow from the bases of their spines.

"It is a case of atavism," one medical man said. "The tailed father and children who inherit the appendage are undoubtedly throwbacks. It is intermittent heredity. It is also harking back to a more or less remote ancestor, due to the reassertion or reawakening of ancestral contributions which have lain for several generations latent or unexpressed."

HERMIT HOPES TO LIVE 350 YEARS

Puts Faith in Water and Pine Bark Cakes.

New York.—An amazing secret of longevity is claimed to have been discovered by a Corean, regarded as a saint, named Skajkinan—amazing in its simplicity as well as in its anticipated results. For it consists in nothing but a diet of water and small cakes made of pine bark.

Upon such food Skajkinan is said to have subsisted for many years, according to reports from Tokio. He is now 60 years old and "still going strong," and expresses the utmost confidence in living for 290 years longer, thus rounding out three centuries and a half.

Such an age is, of course, much less than that credited to the antediluvian patriarchs. But it is precisely twice that attained by Abraham, it is pointed out, and, of course, vastly greater than that attained by any one since his time.

Skajkinan is a hermit, who lives on Corea's holy mountain, Kongosan. He recently went to Tokio to tell of his method of longevity to the members of the Japanese Peer club. He says that he found the secret inscribed in ancient books, which record that in this manner men have prolonged their lives to 500 years.

He sleeps only two hours a day, massages himself and performs other hygienic exercises according to the holy teachings of the Buddhists, and his food consists of a few of the pine bark cakes and one or two glasses of water daily.

As a result of this regimen he said he feels younger and stronger at sixty than he did at thirty years.

Suit Over 4 Cents Drags On 6 Years in France

Paris.—An 83-centime lawsuit has been going on nearly six years in France and the end is not yet in sight. This sum is about 3¾ cents.

Millions of francs have been spent, courts have been occupied for weeks at a time and the best lawyers have argued on both sides.

Marcel Boyer, a well-known "chansonnier," conducting a sort of literary cabaret in the Latin quarter, started the judicial row by refusing to pay a disputed extra tax on two tickets he gave to an old war comrade. Boyer, seeing the soldier at his box office, promptly passed him in, handing 4 francs to the cashier as the government tax on reduced-price tickets. The government inspector demanded 83 centimes more because, he said, Boyer did not go through the formality of buying the low-priced tickets from the box office.

Decisions of all sorts have been handed down, some courts holding one way and some another, but always leaving unsettled some technicality that caused new trials. These rehearings then went to other jurisdictions. The case has traveled pretty well over central France since it started November 27, 1921.

Sixteen Skeletons Found Under Berlin Elevated

Berlin.—From midnight to dawn 16 skeletons of men, thought to have been murdered secretly in the revolution of 1918, were unearthed in the foundations of Berlin's elevated line. The burial ground was between the former military hospital and barracks, the scene of some of the cruelest battles of the revolution. The papers report that skulls were cracked by the butt ends of guns, which strengthens the theory that the bones are those of victims of the revolution, though a group of experts assert that the skeletons are a century old.

Russian Claims to Have One Million Dependents

Moscow.—Income tax time in soviet Russia awoke an echo of the past when a workingman, presenting himself for tax assessment, was asked to fill out a blank indicating, for purposes of tax deduction, the individuals who had been dependent on his earnings.

"A wife, a mother-in-law, and one million British miners," he wrote into the card. The claim in full was not allowed.

"Prettiest Coed" Scorns Short Hair and Smoking

Jackson, Miss.—The prettiest girl at Millsaps college has never bobbed her hair or smoked a cigarette, and is far from the so-called "collegiate" type.

Ruth Buck is an Irish beauty, with deep blue eyes and wavy brown hair. She is not famed as an athlete, but during her three years in college she has made exceptionally high grades and is an accomplished violinist.

Finds "1882" Turtle

Wabash, Ind.—Mrs. William Lotz, living at Disko, in the northern part of the county, has proof that turtles live to be at least forty-five years old. She found a turtle in the back yard of her home on whose back was carved "A. F. Landis, 1882."

Giraffe Centenary

Paris.—Paris is celebrating a new centenary this year—that of the giraffe. Some interested zoologists discovered that it was just 100 years ago, in 1827, that the first giraffe came to the zoo at the Jardin des Plantes

By Sweat and By Brawn

—A Labor Day Soliloquy

I pause, just for a day.
The wheels have ceased to whirl at giddy pace
And I can rest. My name is Labor.
Upon me every tower of fame is built,
And, at my fashioning, each great advance
That has lent magic to our modern day
Came into being. Upon my shoulders rest
The burden of the running of a world.
I am the rock that must sustain it all.
I build your cities, after which I bring
All their improvements, and I lay the rails
On which your commerce travels to earth's end.
And then the ships—
Out of great timbers I have builded them
And overlaid their hulls with sheets of steel.
I, Labor, grew the food that must sustain
Life in your body, vigor in your brain.
Without me all the parasites of life
Would reach an end.

I am the first and last of everything—Labor!
Blest by the joy of struggle, I achieve;
Rewarded in each conquest, I go on.

But should I die? Should Labor cease to be—
With toil suspended, who would run the world?
Could Fashion and her eager devotees,
Society, Money, and such folk as these
Keep the world turning? No, it must be me,
Labor! And when Labor ends
There culminates all progress in the world.

DAY IS MORE THAN RESPITE FROM TOIL

Labor's Holiday Has Special Significance.

By WILLIAM GREEN,
President A. F. of L.

President William Green believes Labor day ought to be observed as labor's day, and not just like any other holiday. He believes this day should be particularly a day for labor, that celebrations should have outstanding labor characteristics.

What President Green believes is that Labor day is something greater and deeper and more sincere than a mere merry-making time. It is more serious that a roller-coaster day.

Says President Green:

"Do the men and women of labor intend that Labor day be observed as a mere holiday or used for personal convenience, or have they considered or are they considering how best they may make it enthusiastically demonstrative of labor's unity, labor's solidarity, labor's hopes, aims, purposes, achievements?

© HARRIS & EWING

William Green.

"Labor day belongs to the working people of America. It is for the men and women of labor to demonstrate year after year its value and significance. Those outside the labor movement are prone to a considerable degree to test its strength and virility by the way in which Labor day is observed. Labor day was made a national institution by the workers who preceded you. You owe it to them and to the future to do your part in perpetuating this institution by appropriate celebration.

"The first Monday of September of each year the factory whistles are silent, the mining shafts are closed down, the blacksmith's anvil is cold, the machinist's lathe is quiet—labor takes a holiday. And not only organized labor but all labor, for the beneficent laws the enactment of which is secured through the efforts of organized labor, affect alike the organized and the unorganized; those who stand shoulder to shoulder with their fellows and those who travel their own road careless of whether it parallels the pathway of their fellow workers.

"Some of the labor organizations have abandoned regular labor demonstrations, parades, meetings, addresses, in the belief that such expenditure of time, effort and money is wasteful. This is a serious mistake. Men and women marching shoulder to shoulder typify impressively the purposes and unity of the labor movement. Such parades are an educational avenue by which public thought and opinion may be more forcefully directed to the consideration of the aspirations, hopes and principles of the labor movement.

"It must not be forgotten that no human movement remains stationary. The labor movement must either go forward, or it must lag backward. The spirit of fellowship is the life of the labor movement. All life must be nourished, or it dies. The yearly gathering on Labor day, the contact of worker with worker, the enthusiasm of all working together in a demonstration of the power and might of labor as a civic as well as an economic force, stimulates fellowship, brotherhood, good will; renews inspiration; gives a deeper insight into the meaning and scope of the labor movement.

"It is my earnest hope that in every city, town and hamlet in our broad land, Labor day will always be an epoch-making day, one long to be remembered."

Labor Unions Facing Problems of Society

The great economic power of labor unions has somewhat deadened old sentiments. The position of wage earners today is incomparably better than it was 40 years ago. The laboring classes fighting for their rights have become indistinguishable in a common mass of humanity, all fighting for the best way out of the problems which confront them all as a whole. Mr. Green's demand for "an abundant life—a life of freedom, of self-expression, of spiritual beauty . . . with leisure, recreation and material blessings," marks the chasm which separates him from those leaders who 40 years ago were fighting for what might be called "the living wage." The chasm is an advance and the plea is reasonable. But securing its fulfillment demands not merely the success of the organized labor movement but the success of society as a whole, in which organized labor must find its place as a constructive force. There are many abuses to be eliminated. But the problems of the present are not altogether the problems of injustice; they are the problems of human incapacity.—New York Herald-Tribune.

Gompers' Memory Honored

Memorial services are held annually at the grave of Samuel Gompers in Sleepy Hollow cemetery. A floral piece is placed on the grave as token of the affection and esteem in which his memory is held by the trade unions of Westchester county, New York; the Trades and Labor Council of Greater New York and the New York State Federation of Labor.

TWO WOMEN FOUND HELP

Their Sickness Banished by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Mrs. Nina Matteson, Box 206, Oxford, N. Y., writes—"If it had not been for your medicine, I could not have done my work as it should have been done. Mother told me of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and I had read in different papers what it had done for different women. She wanted me to try it, so my husband got me one bottle at first; then I took two others. Now I am feeling quite strong again."

Mrs. Ernest Tanguay of Adams, Mass., says she was ill for four years and could not sleep nights or go out on the street. She read about the Vegetable Compound and decided to try it. After taking eight bottles she was able to do all her work and go anywhere and is quite herself again.

This dependable Vegetable Compound is a household word in thousands of homes. The fourth generation is now learning the merit of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

For more than half a century, this reliable medicine has been used by women with very satisfactory results. If the Vegetable Compound has helped other women, why shouldn't it help you?

Passport Photos Must Resemble Applicants

Proof of the vanity of some women is often furnished in the New York customs house by passport applicants, according to Frederick Tisdale in an article in Liberty. The author quotes an official of the New York passport office who says, "We are often amused by some of the photographs submitted by older applicants. A woman of fifty will bring in a photograph copied from a picture made when she was in high school. We explain tactfully that the photo is necessary for identifying the passport holder, and we are forced to point out that the applicant resembles the earlier picture only vaguely after all these years. Sometimes they regard our attitude as a personal offense."

FACTS
—AND THE OPEN MIND

THE MOST important element in business success—and the most difficult—is to be sure that you have all the facts before you act.

TO GET them all, from every possible source, is the first objective in General Motors. The Research Laboratories contribute some. These are nuggets, left in the crucible, after hundreds of ideas that looked good have been burned away. The Proving Ground contributes others. Dealers contribute. The public contributes. Every department contributes. Through the whole organization runs a spirit of inquiry and of rigid insistence on proof.

OUT OF such thinking come the new models announced from time to time by Chevrolet, Pontiac, Oldsmobile, Oakland, Buick, LaSalle, Cadillac—all with Fisher Bodies. And by Frigidaire. Each new model is a tested step forward. Nothing goes into it as a result of habit or guess or pride of opinion.

Nothing counts but hard-won facts, gathered and used with an open mind.

Swiftest Sea Bird

The frigate bird is the swiftest of all sea birds. In the equatorial isles of the Pacific these birds are fed by the natives before they learn to fly. They soon become so tame that they will return to their perch at night, after a day of perfect freedom.

Engine-House For School Building Being Re-built

A group of workmen have been busy the past week tearing down the south and west walls of the engine-house for the school building, for it was found that the south wall was crumbling, and needed to be rebuilt. The level of the Engine-house floor has also been sunk by excavating it. It became only a few inches higher than the basement level when the new concrete floor was put in, whereas formerly it was above ground-level.

Helmer Brenna and Leonard Swan left the forepart of the week for Dakota to take in the threshing.

Times-Tribune Consolidate

Thief River Falls now has one newspaper, as the outcome of a merger effected last week by the Times and the Tribune. The name "Times" will be continued in the new publication. The owners will be Mattson Bros., proprietors of the old Times, and Wm. Dahlquist, who was part owner of the Tribune. They will form a new company to be known as The Thief River Falls Times, Inc. Ludwig I. Roe of Montevideo disposes of his interest in the Tribune to the new company.

With one of two exceptions the former employees of both papers will continue with the new company. The old Times editor, Dreng Bjornaraa, leaves to attend the University of Minnesota. Wm. Dahlquist, editor of the Tribune, will be editor and advertising manager for the new publication, and Scott Laird, Associated Press representative, will be news editor.

This consolidation is a step which could have been justified were it accomplished long ago. Under present conditions, at least, Thief River Falls needs two newspapers no more than it does two postoffices.

The NEWS congratulates the men who effected this progressive step.

Collision North of Town Early Sunday Morning

Early Sunday morning a Chevrolet coupe driven by Arthur Conklin and a new Ford sedan driven by Clarence Doran came to blows on the state highway almost opposite the Heinze farm north of town and, as both cars were traveling at a pretty good rate of speed, they were smashed up quite badly.

Mr. Doran says he saw a car coming towards him on the right side of the road, and he swung out to the left to pass it. The other car swuug out at the same time, meeting him on the extreme left. Doran's car was hurled into the ditch, while Conklin's car remained on the road. Both cars remained upright.

The Chevrolet suffered a bent frame, a broken windshield, a smashed right front wheel, and various other things; the Ford received a v-shaped radiator, a cork-screw right fender, and a broken front spring; while the drivers got a few scratches, a shaking up, and a bad scare.

A wrecking truck from Thief River Falls came immediately to pick up the pieces.

The Green Cloak

STORY FROM THE START

Dr. Ronald McAlister, famous in his special work—applied psychology—employs his leisure time in the elucidation of crime mysteries. As the narrative opens he is interested with Assistant District Attorney Ashton in the murder, in the small town of Oak Ridge, of a recluse, Henry Morgan. The murdered man, his papers reveal, had been in New Zealand, where Doctor McAlister had lived in his youth. Will Harvey has testified he saw a woman wearing a green cloak in the Morgan home the night of the murder. Doctor Reinhardt, friend of McAlister, telephones he has a queer case in his hospital and invites McAlister to see the patient. Doctor Reinhardt's patient proves to be a young woman, who in unconsciousness mutters in a language Reinhardt does not understand. McAlister sees a possible connection between the murdered New Zealander and the girl. A carefully hidden map is discovered. A girl enters the house in the darkness and escapes, leaving a green cloak behind.

"I was on the point of telephoning for you," he said, "but you've saved the precious hour or two by coming on your own account. Mallory reported to me here at six o'clock this morning, having come all the way from Oak Ridge on foot, and without getting the slightest trace of the mysterious woman who invaded the Morgan house last night. I confess that her appearance throws a different light on Harvey's testimony. And I think you'll agree that, in all probability, she is the criminal."

"I've no doubt myself," said Doctor McAlister, "that it was her hands that strangled old Morgan."

"Well, then, she's the criminal, isn't she?" said Ashton; and regarding the answer to this question as too obvious to be waited for, he went straight on. "The whole energies of the police and of all the detective force connected with our office will be bent toward finding her. What I want from you—from both of you, independently—is the most complete and careful description you can give of the physical appearance of the woman who entered Henry Morgan's study last night."

"You can describe her for yourself," said Doctor McAlister rather shortly. "You have a talent that way."

"What do you mean?"

"You've seen her. You've enjoyed a good look at her. She's the girl that Reinhardt sent for us to see at St. Michael's two nights ago."

Ashton stared in clear amazement, first at the doctor and then at me.

"You're sure?" he gasped.

"Perfectly," said I gravely.

For a moment he sat silent. Then he frowned.

"May I ask whether you had any suspicion, when we saw her there at the hospital, that she might prove to have some connection with this case?"

"Yes," said my chief bluntly; "it's your right to ask. I did suspect a connection between her and the Oak Ridge mystery. I recognized and understood the language in which she was chattering to herself. It's a language that, with minor variations, is spoken in all those islands in the South Pacific. The thing she was singing to herself was a death chant."

Ashton looked pretty grave at that. "I won't presume," he said, "to question your motive for your reticence with me the other night. Undoubtedly it seemed justifiable to you, but, as a result of it, a dangerous criminal is now at large. I admit it was not a result you could have foreseen, for I remember your recommendation that she be closely watched, and I have no doubt that with the clew you've just given me it won't be many hours before we find her. A strange creature like that, half-wild, chattering a language that no one can understand, cannot remain hidden very long. I can't understand, though," he went on, "the reason you gentlemen have for wishing to withhold from me your full confidence. You haven't given it to me yet. You've discovered something more that bears upon this case which I haven't heard of."

"We have," said the doctor, "and it was with the purpose of telling you about it that we came back to town this morning—that was part of our purpose, at any rate. Do you remember the green cloak which you so confidently declared to be nothing but a bit of fiction, born of Will Harvey's puerile vanity? Well, we've found that. A green cloak, with a high collar, just as Harvey described it."

Ashton eagerly demanded the details as to where and how the cloak was found, and these I supplied him with.

Then there was a little silence. His displeasure over our previous reticence was suddenly swallowed up in his interest in the revelations we made to him.

"That's one to Mallory, certainly," he said at last. "He was right and I was wrong."

"How do you make that out?" I questioned.

"Didn't I tell you that Mallory suspected Harvey of some active connection with the crime, and thought that he was lying to shield himself? The discovery of the cloak makes it evident that he was right. He knew who the actual criminal was, knows now, and was undoubtedly associated with her. He probably thought to save himself by giving us the clew that would lead to her detection. In his eagerness, he overreached himself and told too much, told more than he could possibly have seen, if his testimony as to how he saw it were true."

He broke off there with a short laugh. "But confess," he said, turning to my chief, "confess that this discovery of Phelps puts your theory of associative illusion completely out of court. Harvey testified to a black-haired woman in a green cloak, and denies that he saw more of her than her silhouette upon the shade. We know now that a black-haired woman in a green cloak was actually there, from which it follows that Harvey lied, knew that he lied. And to have lied thus about a matter which he knew to be vital and significant, he must have some powerful, and probably guilty, motive. I don't believe that you can get away from the logic of that."

"Your conclusion is probable," said my chief, "but it's not inevitable."

Ashton dismissed the denial with a mere tolerant shrug, and set it down to the obstinacy of old age.

"You brought the cloak to town with you, I suppose," he went on presently.

I nodded. "You'll want it, I presume?"

"Yes," he said. "It may prove a valuable bit of bait, not for the girl herself, of course, but possibly for one of her accomplices. I'll have Harvey arrested at once. Surveillance isn't good enough for him now; I want him in jail."

"You promised me a chance at Harvey after you got through with him. Do you remember?" said the doctor. "I hope you don't mean to withdraw it."

Ashton stared at him. "You still think you can beat up anything in that covert?" he asked incredulously. "Oh, well, I've no objection to your trying. I'll have him arrested at once and brought to town. Where do you want him? At your laboratory?"

"Yes," said the doctor. "When may we expect him? This afternoon, some time?"

"Yes," said Ashton. "Not later than four o'clock."

The doctor swallowed the last of his coffee, pushed back his chair, and rose to his great ungainly height.

"Now, let's have an understanding," said he. "I've given you, freely, all the information you've asked for. It comprises pretty much all the information you have which can be of any service to you in the solution of the mystery of this crime. That, of course, is partly due to luck. I believe that I can solve that mystery by my methods. I believe that with your methods you will fail. Phelps and I are going to set about trying to find that girl for ourselves, in our own way. If we find her, we will examine her in our own way; and we sha'n't tell you anything about it until our investigation is complete."

Ashton smiled. "Of course you know," said he, "that you are proposing something that, under my oath of office, I can't permit. If you find that girl—I don't think it very likely that you will, but if you do, I shall be obliged to take her away from you and put her in safe keeping. And the methods I'll use to determine her guilt or innocence will be my methods, and not yours."

The doctor laughed. "That's understood," he said. "You're welcome to take her wherever you can find her, in my laboratory, or anywhere else. But if you don't find her—"

"That's thin ice, Doctor McAlister," Ashton interrupted earnestly. "If you proceed with that express determination of yours, I may find it necessary, little as I'd like to, to have you watched, as persons suspected of compounding a felony."

"All right," said the doctor. "That's understood. Watch away all you like. But you'll still let me have a chance at Harvey?"

Ashton shrugged his shoulders with a vexation that was half-genuine, half-simulated. "You don't deserve it," he said, "but I've made a promise and I'll stick to it."

CHAPTER V

I fully expected that after the grilling he had received at the hands of the district attorney, Harvey would prove a recalcitrant and reluctant subject for the tests we wished to try upon him. He was nervous, it is true, and it took a good deal of reassuring of the most tactful sort, on Doctor McAlister's part, to get him quieted down into anything like a normal state of mind; but he was perfectly willing.

His first sight of the queer, mysterious-looking instruments which our big room contained did nothing to counteract that fear. To the eye of ignorance it must look like a torture chamber from the Inquisition, brought down to date.

My chief spent the better part of an hour taking the young man around and explaining the different instruments to him, and it was not long before young Harvey began to show an inclination to test himself by every electrical and mechanical piece of apparatus in the laboratory. He had forgotten the Oak Ridge mystery, forgotten Ashton, forgotten his recent arrest, forgotten, even, the detective who was waiting in the corridor outside.

He was ready at last for our real experiment. Nothing about Doctor McAlister's manner suggested that there was any difference, from our point of view, between the amusing things we had been doing and the test which he now proposed.

"I'm going to see how quickly you can think," he said. "You're to sit down in this chair, and Mr. Phelps here will read you a list of words. The instant he reads a word, you are to say, aloud, the word it makes you think of—say it just as quickly as you can. You've shown an unusually quick reaction time so far, but this is a better test than any of them. We hang up a pair of little telephones, so—one in front of you and one in front of Mr. Phelps. The moment he speaks a word it makes a little mark on that revolving cylinder. The moment you speak, a second mark is made. The cylinder turns round all the while, and the distance between the two marks shows how quickly or how slowly you think."

I ran my eye down the list which my chief had prepared, with a good deal of care, while we were waiting for them to bring Harvey to the laboratory. The first twelve words were what we call central, that is, they had no connection, so far as we know, with the crime, the mystery or the inquest. In telling us his association with them, which he would probably do freely enough, our subject would establish his normal speed in this sort of mental operation.

But the thirteenth word was Loops and the fourteenth was Pipe. The associations he should announce with those two words and the time he should take in pronouncing them would go far toward establishing a conviction in the doctor's mind and in mine as to whether Harvey had guilty knowledge of the means which had been employed for the old man's murder. If he had such guilty knowledge, if he had seen that ghastly tourniquet made, and twisted it taut himself, or had witnessed the operation, those two simple little words would almost infallibly recall it. The words that would flash into his mind might be violin, perhaps, or throat, or even, possibly, the plain black word murder.

If some such word as that, some damaging, suggestive word, should flash into his mind, one of two things would happen. He would either say it aloud, or he would stop himself from saying it, and deliberately think up another word which, to our ears, could have no sinister significance. But that latter course of action would betray him as certainly as the other, for thought takes time, and the fact that he had been obliged to stop to think would be remorselessly and exactly shown in the chronograph.

Killer Whale Has No Equal for Ferocity

The killer whale is the undisputed champion of the sea, declares Mack Sennett, who, as a hobby, has made an exhaustive study of marine life in Lower California seas. "If there is anything that can lick the killer whale, I have never heard of it," Sennett says. "Everything that swims the waters of the earth dreads the terrible killer whale.

"Strictly speaking," the writer explains, "it isn't a fish; it is an air-breathing mammal about 35 feet long. It has huge jaws and heavy fighting teeth. Its head suggests the head of a bulldog, as does its disposition. What makes it more terrible than other big sea monsters is its great speed. Nothing can escape it.

"The favorite dish of the killer whale is the succulent tongue of the real whale," the writer continues. "Its method of killing the whale is curious. When the big fellow comes up to breathe, the killer fastens its jaws on the whale's blowhole and does not let go. Finally, dying of suffocation, the whale thrusts out its great, agonized tongue. The killer nips this off and goes blithely on its way. It is a common sight to find a tongueless dead whale floating in the water."

VISIT OF LINDBERGH PROMOTES INTEREST IN ALL AERONAUTICS

BY H. M. ZAHL

That North Dakota is intensely interested in the possibilities of commercial aviation was evidenced by the huge crowd that greeted Col. Charles A. Lindbergh when he visited Fargo last week. It is estimated that at least 50,000 persons saw the hero of the first non-stop flight from New York to Paris and heard him urge the northwest to get behind commercial aviation, in his speech at El Zagal park.

Zooming in from the north, Colonel Lindbergh dropped over the crowd awaiting his arrival, floated over the mass in an airman's courtesy and then landed at the field west of the fair grounds where he was greeted with waving flags and shouts of "Hello, Lindy!" After he stepped from the "Spirit of St. Louis," the flier was greeted by Mayor J. H. Dahl, who welcomed him in the "Spirit of North Dakota."

As the parade started down Thirteenth street Colonel Lindbergh assumed his characteristic parade position, seated on the folded top of an open car, with his feet in the seat. Sidewalks along the route were lined with chering men, women and children. The fast clip at which the parade progressed is one of the requirements of those in charge of the tour, as this prevents the crowds closing in on the car. The colonel acknowledged the ovation from the streets with nods, and smiles, and by waving his hand.

Colonel Lindbergh made two speeches while in Fargo. One at El Zagal park and another at the banquet given in his honor. He spoke slowly and distinctly, talking into a microphone, which carried his voice to the thousands of persons who were unable to attend his reception in Fargo. He stated that this is an era of commercial aviation and that the purpose of his visit to the northwest was to interest the people in commercial aviation and the establishing of suitable airports.

He pointed out that Fargo and other North Dakota cities have an opportunity to become stations on a commercial route, which will connect the twin cities with Seattle and Portland. "This is an opportunity for rapid development of Fargo as a commercial aviation center, if she seizes it," he said. "Airplanes know no tracks."

The famous Lindbergh smile, which accentuates his boyishness, was a prominent feature of the banquet. The colonel, who seemed very tired in the afternoon, smiled and talked with those in his immediate vicinity at the table. He apparently had relaxed considerable after the afternoon program.

Congressman O. B. Burtness in an address at the banquet said, "Col. Lindbergh's feat has advanced commercial aviation 50 years," and added that he could assure consideration of any aviation promotion scheme in congress which was "fair, reasonable and practical." Congressman J. H. Sinclair of the third district added his pledge to those of the other speakers in helping put across a practical commercial aviation program.

Here are a few of Colonel Lindbergh's views, as expressed while in Fargo:

He believes commercial aviation is developing far more rapidly than people realize.

He is of the opinion that Fargo's possibilities as an airport are greater than most cities of this size, for it is strategically located for the big air lines.

He is not in favor of congress enacting a law that will restrict "pioneering" aviators from taking risks on long stunt flights whether over land or sea. He believes, however, that all aviators who undertake such flights should be prepared in every way for them. He thinks that such a law would cut down the development of aviation. That it would be killing pioneering.

"Commercial aviation is an established thing. It no longer is an experiment. It is developing faster than you realize. It is coming to Fargo and North Dakota. I don't know how soon, but it shouldn't be long. That will depend, in a very large measure, on the people of the northwest."

While in Fargo, Colonel Lindbergh reminisced briefly of his momentous trip across the Atlantic. When informed that some writers still were doubtful about the first words uttered after landing at Le Bourget field, Paris, he said: "I've explained that a number of times. When I landed and saw the crowd coming towards my ship, I asked: 'Are there any mechanics here? Is there anyone in control?' I quickly saw that they didn't understand me and didn't want to, so I kept quiet."

Colonel Lindbergh remained in Fargo over night and left for Sioux Falls, S. D., at 8:15 a. m. the following morning. His visit was a success for it accomplished his purpose of stimulating interest in commercial aviation.

North Dakota will long remember the visit of the hero of the first nonstop flight between New York and Paris. Colonel Lindbergh's visit clearly demonstrated that this state is greatly interested in aviation and its possibilities

As We Grow Older

Proper Kidney Function Is More Than Ever Important.

As we grow older, there is apt to be a gradual slowing up of bodily functions.

The kidneys are the blood filters. If their action becomes sluggish they do not thoroughly cleanse the blood of poisonous wastes. This tends to make one tired and achy, with often a nagging backache, drowsy headaches and dizziness. A common symptom of imperfect kidney action is scanty or burning excretions.

Elderly people recommend Doan's Pills. This tested diuretic is endorsed the country over. Ask your neighbor!

The Come-Back

Bliss Perry, editor and author, is one of the leading members of the American academy, and at a Cambridge garden party the other day he listened with a smile to a young jazz novelist's diatribe against the famous institution.

"The French academy is a bluff," the young novelist wound up, "and the American academy is only a poor imitation of it."

Mr. Perry's smile changed to a laugh, and then he said:

"Our American academy is like death. People only poke fun at it when they know there's no danger of its gathering them in."

Librarians Are Scarce

School libraries are being installed more rapidly than librarians with the necessary educational and professional qualifications can be found to take charge of them. The number of graduates in 1926 from library schools in the United States was 200 less than the number required to meet the need for graduate librarians, says the United States Department of the Interior.

WOMEN CAN NOW DO MORE

Because Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Keeps Them Well

Fifty years ago there were few occupations for women. Some taught school, some did housework, some found work to do at home and a few took up nursing.

Today there are very few occupations not open to women. Today they work in factories with hundreds of other women and girls. There are also women architects, lawyers, dentists, executives, and legislators. But all too often a woman wins her economic independence at the cost of her health.

Mrs. Elizabeth Chamberlain who works in the Unionall factory making overalls writes that she got "wonderful results" from taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. Mrs. Chamberlain lives at 500 Monmouth St., Trenton, N. J. She recommends the Vegetable Compound to her friends in the factory and will gladly answer any letters she gets from women asking about it.

If Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has helped other women, why shouldn't it help you?

Her Disappointment

"What's the matter, Blondie?" asked Heloise, head waitress of the rapid-fire restaurant. "What's been coming off?"

"I was never so flusticated in my life!" replied Blondie. "A fella came in just now and acted for all the world as if he was going to grab and kiss me. I says to him, just like this: 'Sir-r-r, you don't dare to kiss me!' and I had sized the dumbhead up exactly right—he didn't! He had St. Vitus dance; that was what was the matter with him."

FLYING IS FELT IN ARCHITECTURE

Roofs and Skylines Are to Be More Pleasing.

Washington.—Architecture is another profession that is being influenced by the great development of aviation. This is exemplified by the design prepared by Frank E. McMillan, superintendent of the division of post office quarters and engineering, for the proposed new Chicago post office, which contemplates a great flat roof, 320 feet wide and 800 feet long.

The evolution of architectural styles, like all natural evolution, is a slow process following the improved needs of growing intelligence. In America architecture is less than three hundred years old. In this period it has progressed from the log cabin to our modern monumental buildings. It took 1,000 years to produce the Egyptian temple, 500 years to build the Greek temples and 300 years to erect Imperial Rome. And never were the demands and requirements as many as today. In materials, in structure and in purpose, the task of the architect is increasingly gigantic. And now the architect's purpose is to be changed if not dominated by our getting into the air.

Not just for the landing spaces are modern cities concerned. An artistic view from the air is demanded. German architects are studying this matter with the intention of recommending improvements in the aspect from the bird's eye.

Therefore we may expect roof gardens. Also we may not be surprised to see some of the billboards that line the automobile trails go up and lie down on top of the business houses. Atlanta tells the flying world that it is "Atlanta" by spelling it out on top of one of the highest buildings.

Our future cities will present an entirely different skyline, experts say. Such Gothic buildings as the Woolworth skyscraper and those of Chicago university with points and spikes and towers discouraging to aviators probably will disappear.

Lieut. Bernt Balchen, who piloted the giant "America" through hours of storm and fog over France looking for a place to come down, said in answer to those who were surprised that he could not see the Eiffel tower: "No, I did not want to see it. I was mighty glad that I did not see it."

Indians Enjoyed Rolling Bones, Relics Indicate

Oklahoma City, Okla.—Historians may not chronicle the fact that the American Indians of old rolled dice, gambled, and used rouge and powder, but the large Indian collection of Edward Snow, local collector, bears witness that they did.

Snow has one of the largest Indian collections in the city, particularly in regard to stone relics, some rare, aged, and of historical significance.

Among the thousand or more items in his collection are Indian gambling stones used in the manner almost identical to dice.

Snow also exhibits stones, thin and round, which speculation would have as Indian poker chips. On this order there are also larger stones, apparently used for lagging for a line, much in the manner of "pitching pennies," or as target for spears.

Snow's oldest relics date back four centuries. The exhibit as it now is was collected from states. It includes arrowheads, hatchets, spears, knives, scrapes, hoes, grain mortars, and bits of pottery.

The collection also harbors a Mexican spearhead dug from the walls of the Alamo after its fall, as well as a number of guns from past conflicts.

Falls 19,000 Feet Before Parachute Opens; Lives

Paris.—Dropping 19,000 feet from a falling airplane and yet living to tell the tale was the experience of a French pilot, Emile Van Laere. An airplane which he was testing near Beaumont sur Oise in the forest of Carnelle, began to fall from a height of 7,000 meters, it is said. The parachute did not open until he was a thousand feet from the ground. Although somewhat stunned from his descent, Van Laere was uninjured.

Chamberlin Flight May Cut Sea Trips

Washington.—Clarence Chamberlin's successful flight from the Leviathan at sea to New York with mail marks the beginning of a service which may reduce the time of the Atlantic crossing to less than three days, in the opinion of W. Irving Glover, second assistant postmaster general.

David A. Burke, general manager of the United States lines, is confident that Chamberlin's feat will lead to a shortening of transatlantic trips, he said in a letter to Chairman O'Connor of the shipping board, written aboard the Leviathan and carried ashore by Chamberlin.

Glover declared Chamberlin had brought nearer the consummation of Post Office department plans for the establishment of ship-to-shore and shore-to-ship service for transatlantic mail.

VON STEUBEN'S DRILL BOOK FOUND IN OHIO

Rare Volume Is Found in Old Bureau Drawer.

London.—Phantom memories of the days of George Washington and the establishment of this nation are revived by the relic of the early days of the United States of America found in an old bureau drawer by Mrs. Bettie Wilson Neville of this city.

The relic is an old book, said to be one of the only two copies in existence, the other being guarded jealously at the United States military academy at West Point.

It is the first drill book of the United States army, prepared by Baron Von Steuben, friend and aid to Gen. George Washington at Valley Forge, and it bears the publication date of 1794 and is entitled:

"Regulations for the Order and Discipline of the Troops of the United States, to which is added an appendix, containing the United States Militia Act, passed by congress May, 1792. A new edition illustrated by eight copper plates accurately engraved. By Baron Von Steuben, late major general and inspector general of the army of the United States, No. 46 Newbury street, Boston, MDCCXCIV."

Offered $1,000 for Find.

Mrs. Neville says Henry Ford has offered her $1,000 for the book, but she intends to keep it, together with other old books which she treasures.

Quotations from the book which follow are particularly interesting to military men today, especially those who served in the recent World war.

"The arms and accoutrements of the officers, noncommissioned officers and soldiers should be uniform throughout.

"A company is to be formed in two ranks at one pace distance, with the tallest men in the rear, with the shortest men in the center.

"A company thus drawn up is to be divided into two sections or platoons, the captain to take post on the right, covered by a sergeant." and so on through all the minute details of the army regulations.

Covers of Wood.

Rookies were treated to a real, man-size code of drilling, some of the regulations being:

"The position of a soldier without arms—He is to stand straight and firm upon his legs, with the head turned to the right so far as to bring the left eye over the waistcoat buttons, the heels two inches apart, the toes turned out, the belly drawn in a little," etc.

"Attention—at this word the soldier must be silent, stand firm and steady, moving neither hand nor foot," and so on for ninety-one pages, closing with the order to the private to "always carry a stopper for the muzzle of the gun in case of rain."

The covers of the old book of Mrs. Neville are made of wood, covered with paper.

Oklahoma Land Office Retires From Business

Guthrie, Okla.—The latest landmark to disappear in the frontier in the West, and in Oklahoma in particular, is the United States land office at Guthrie which was closed and discontinued by executive order recently.

"Lack of business" was the reason given for the discontinuance of the office. Al records and what little business remained will be taken to Washington and placed in the offices of the Department of the Interior.

The Guthrie land office saw its first business at noon of April 22, 1889, when the famous "run of '89" was made into Oklahoma Territory. It was the only building for miles. Government agents were on duty ready to register claims and issue deeds and titles.

From that day forward the little office literally did a "land office" business, the city of Guthrie growing up around the little shack. The little shack has long since gone, but the office was housed in the federal building at Guthrie.

What to Do With Old Safety Razor Blades

Boston.—F. M. Durkee of Brookline has solved one of the world's great problems: What to do with old safety razor blades. Seven years ago illness left him too weak to push a lawn mower and the green grass grew all around. So he mounted the motor of an old cleaner on a flat axle connecting a couple of toy cart wheels.

Through holes he bored in the axle he ran shafts about 4 inches long and ⅜ of an inch in diameter. At the tops of these shafts he put pulleys and connected them by a sewing machine belt to the shaft of the motor. On the bottom of the shafts he fastened thin brass discs about 4 inches in diameter and finally bolted the razor blades to the ends of these discs.

A long lamp cord conveyed power from a plug in the house to the handle of the mower and thence to the motor. The machine was light. Durkee could push it easily while the power whirled the cutting discs and the green grass flew all around.

ART FINDS PROOF IN X-RAY TESTS

Practice Strokes Revealed on Masterpieces.

New York.—The shadowy ghosts of pictures that a painter starts to bring to life on canvas and then impatiently paints out and covers over with a new and better design can be brought out of their state of invisibility and made to testify to the authorship of the paintings, new X-ray tests of famous paintings indicate.

X-ray films of two famous paintings, "Mars and Venus" by Veronese, and Madonna and Child" with the infant St. John by Antonello da Messina, have been completed by Alan Burroughs, working under the auspices of the Fogg museum at Cambridge. Results of the tests reported to the Bulletin of the Metropolitan Museum of Art show that the artist's preliminary experiments with his canvas reveal important information to the art critic, particularly in showing whether the picture is an original or a copy.

"When an artist evolves a masterpiece, he has to correct as he proceeds, if he has not already trained himself to perfection's high point," Mr. Burroughs states. "And the most skillful painters often change their minds. But a copyist or imitator is insensitive to the reasons for such alterations, remaining content to perform his task mechanically. Changes in underpaint are thus an indication of originality when the hidden work agrees in style with that on the surface."

In the case of the Madonna painting, he says, the face of the Virgin "was originally tilted slightly more to her left. Two nostrils on the same side of the nose, two pairs of lips, and two lines for the chin enable one to trace the first version fairly accurately."

The experimental painting hidden under the surface paint of "Mars and Venus" showed that the artist had originally depicted the god and goddess in a realistic love scene. This, however, was too emotional a pose for the calm immortals, and he altered the spirit of the picture by raising Venus' head and shifting her weight away from Mars and changing her expression to one of smiling unconcern.

There is no question that Veronese painted the "Mars and Venus." The X-ray study was made, Mr. Burroughs explains, because of the fact that there is a replica of the painting, and the question might be raised as to which was the original. The test settles the question of priority, he states, since no copyist would have reason to experiment so extensively with the composition of the picture.

Students Slide Into Series of Explorations

Vancouver, B. C.—From a 200-foot slide through the murk and slime of a coal seam opening some 800 feet below the level of the ground, to a 1,200-foot slide down the side of one of the most beautiful glaciers in America, is but one of the experiences which the students from Princeton university who accompanied the summer school of geology on its trip to Jasper National park, are talking about.

Deep within the bowels of the earth the party near Brule, Alb., and within the confines of Jasper park, were examining the geological formations. A point was reached where it became necessary to go to a lower level. No way was available save sliding down a chute for coal in the time-honored fashion of kids on a cellar door. This was done and the party emerged on the lower level looking more like actual miners than college men.

Within the next twenty-four hours they had climbed up the shimmering glacier of Mount Edith Cavell to a height of 3,000 feet. Ice picks were used and almost every step had to be cut in the precipitous side wall. It was the first experience of the students at this type of Alpine work, but under the direction of Prof. Leon Collet of Switzerland, a member of the Swiss Alpine club, the party made the ascent to view some of the formations. Returning by way of a long and inviting snow field and using nothing but reinforced trouser seats as sleighs, the party glissaded down a distance of 1,200 feet to land in snow beds.

Motor Toll in 8 Years Exceeds U. S. War Dead

Washington. — More people have been killed by automobiles in the United States during the last eight years than the American soldier dead in the World war, according to the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce.

From January 1, 1919, to December 31, 1926, 137,017 persons were killed by automobiles, while the total casualties of the war in the American armed forces was 120,050. The injured in automobile accidents, however, was 3,500,000 since the armistice.

Twenty-six per cent of the killed and injured were children under fifteen. Last year it was estimated 23,000 persons were killed, an increase of 1,000 over 1925 and the largest death toll ever recorded by automobiles for a year.

This month we find some new names among the first five on The Honor Roll. Mike Leiran heads the list with a large margin. Mike lives twenty miles from towm and, in spite of that distance he delivers a very good product, most of it Land o' Lakes. Albert Klungness is the other new patron among the topnotchers. Albert raises some mighty fine alfalfa which, together with his sweet clover, is what made his landing place among the highest for month of July.

Instead of writing an article myself, I am copying an article published by the Farmers Co-op. Creamery, Frazee, Minnesota, as follows:

"Your co-operative creamery fixes the price on butterfat.

"With no co-operative creamery, who will fix the value of butterfat? The buyer of it, of course. Think it over.

"More cream at the local creamery means better prices to all.

"Who pays the expenses of your cream stations? You do, if you patronize them. Figure this out for yourself.

"The co-operative creamery makes the best butter. Good butter insures the best prices for butter.

"Your co-operative creamery can pay as much and more for your cream than any cream buyer or centralizer. If you are selling your cream elsewhere and getting a higher test and price than you would receive at your local creamery, you should not conclude that the creamery is wrong, but investigate, and you may find that the other fellow is baiting you to get your business. When your co-operative creamery is killed, what then?

"The operator in your creamery is a member of the Minnesota Creamery Operator's and Manager's Association and is fully qualified to operate the plant. He is working for a salary and could gain nothing by cutting your weights or tests. It is to his interest to treat every patron right and in that way build up the business, and a good position for himself.

"The co-operative creamery is no experiment. There are 640 such creameries in Minnesota.

"The co-operative plan of operating a creamery is the safest plan in the world for the farmer. You control the business at all times. The products are sold to the best possible advantage, and after deducting expenses, the balance is paid out to patrons in proportion to the amount of fat delivered by each patron. Nothing could be safer and more economical.

"If you are now a patron of your co-operative creamery, stand by it and help make your business still better and stronger than it now is. If you are not patronizing the creamery, you are not getting what you should for your butterfat. Call at the creamery, and we will gladly explain anything you wish to know about the business—your business."

There is enough food for thot in this article to have it framed and hungup where you can see and read it real often. It does us all good to checkup on ourselves every once in awhile.

More About the Big Ditch

The proposed ditch to start at the Heinze corner north of town and to run northwest until it empties into Middle River south of Newfolden, has excited the opposition of a number of farmers around Argyle. Someone has told them that they will be drowned out like rats when the annual spring waters come.

For the benefit of these poor, misguided souls, let it be said that we have no unduly much flood waters on the side of the watershed the new ditch will serve. Ditch No. 15, which runs directly west of the Heinze corner, is inadequate to handle the water on the west side of the watershed—indeed, it floods more land than it drains. The new ditch would relieve the water on the low places right west of Holt and would caary the water directly to Middle River. Once in that river, it wouldn't stop until Red River was reached——away up in Kittson county.

We haven't heard a peep out of the Kittson county farmers concerning this new ditch. They are at the mouth of the river and would be affected most. If they don't see any danger in the new ditch project, why should the farmers around Argyle, who live 20 or 25 miles from the mouth, be alarmed?

There's something not very fresh in Russia, the way those Argyle farmers are opposing the ditch for no apparent reason whatsoever.

The Holt farmers are solidly in favor of this ditch.

Mr. Holt Farmer, do you want your western neighbors to walk all over you out of pure selfishness? Do you want them to tell us what we should and should not do?

FIGHT for the New Ditch!

George Mattson Improving

Word was received this week from Mrs. M. O. Mattson at Crookston that George, who has been very sick for four weeks with scarlet fever and quinsey, passed the danger point safely and is now convalescing. He is very weak yet—is able to sit up for only a few minutes at a time, and cannot walk without assistance. We wish him a quick return to full health and strength.

Arnold and Knut Flakne of Minneapolis motored up here Sunday evening to visit their father, K. O. Flakne, and old friends here and in the Mud Lake country.

Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Hill and daughter Marjorie of Detroit, Mich., who have spent 3 months touring North Dakota, stopped over at Holt Wednesday night to visit Mrs. J. Burns at the C. O. Saastad home. Mrs. Hill was formerly Miss Mary Short.

I wish to thank all those who have contributed to the box we have given to the Lake Park Orphans Home. I feel assured that anyone who has visited one of these institutions will never regret any little gift or kind deed they have shown for these unfortunate ones who cannot enjoy the love or care of a real father and mother. I do not know of any better way in which we could work for the upbuilding of God's Kingdom.

The clinic will be held in the Knox School Building.

This clinic in one of the third annual series conducted by physicians of the State Orthopedic Club under the auspices of the Minnesota Public Health Association. It forms a part of the state-wide health work financed by Christmas Seals.

Mrs. Carl Nyhus

Mrs. Carl Nyhus passed away at her farm home southwest of town last Friday evening at 5:30, after at illness which had lasted for some time. Funeral services were held from the Mission church Sunday, Rev. Myhrer officiating.

Mrs. Nyhus was born in Trysil, Norway, June 4, 1849. Following the trend of immigration, like many other Norwegians of that time, she came to this country in 1882, and with her husband homesteaded the farm southwest of town, where they lived until the time of their deaths.

Of the four children born to Mr. and Mrs. Nyhus, two died in childhood. Mr. Nyhus died in 1910.

The two surviving children are Rudolph Nyhus, local business man, and Mrs. A. O. Thompson. Mr. and Mrs. Thompson and family have been farming the Nyhus homestead for several years.

Besides the two children mentioned, Mrs. Nyhus leaves to mourn her passing two sisters, Mrs. O. L. Bakken of Thief River Falls and Mrs. Anderson of Oslo, Norway; seven grandchildren, and one great-grandchild.

The NEWS extends the deepest sympathy to the bereaved in their hour of sorrow.

CARD of THANKS

We wish to thank our friends and neighbors for the sympathy shown us during the illness and death of our mother and grandmother, and for the beautiful floral offerings. Especially do we wish to thank Mrs. Christ Evenson for her help through the illness. Rev. Myhrer for his services, the choir for the songs rendered at the funeral, and the pallbearers.

STORY FROM THE START

Dr. Ronald McAlister, famous in his special work—applied psychology—employs his leisure time in the elucidation of crime mysteries. As the narrative opens he is interested with Assistant District Attorney Ashton in the murder, in the small town of Oak Ridge, of a recluse, Henry Morgan. The murdered man, his papers reveal, had been in New Zealand, where Doctor McAlister had lived in his youth. Will Harvey has testified he saw a woman wearing a green cloak in the Morgan home the night of the murder. Doctor Reinhardt, friend of McAlister, telephones he has a queer case in his hospital and invites McAlister to see the patient. Doctor Reinhardt's patient proves to be a young woman, who in unconsciousness mutters in a language Reinhardt does not understand. McAlister sees a possible connection between the murdered New Zealander and the girl. A carefully hidden map is discovered. A girl enters the house in the darkness and escapes, leaving a green cloak behind. McAlister decides upon a psychological test of Harvey.

With a feeling of excitement which I found it hard to conceal, I began reading those first twelve neutral words. His answers came with flashlike rapidity. He was a good subject and he had entered fully into the spirit of the test. To my ear the interval between my word and his was about half a second. When I saw the record afterward, I found that it averaged a little less than that—about four-tenths.

The word Pen brought the obvious association, Ink. Snow called up Shovel; and Song, Theater. The twelfth word, Sign, called up the curious association, Woodland, which was to prove of interest and significance to us before the day was out. But I had no time to think about it then.

Without varying the interval, without varying the tone of my voice, or raising my eyes from the list I held in my hand, I pronounced the thirteenth word, Loops.

The answer came like a flash, and it was Automobile. I glanced up as he said it, and caught a faint smile of reminiscence on his lips. Loops in his mind were things to be looped, and the circus billboards supplied the association with automobile. The next word Pipe, brought the simple association, Tobacco. To my mind his unhesitating utterance of that word was as good a demonstration of his innocence of the crime itself as a completely established alibi would have been.

But we were only at the beginning of our experiment. Neither the doctor nor I believed him guilty. We both believed that, hidden in some corner of that mind of his, was a piece of unsuspected knowledge which would give us the key with which to unlock the heart of the mystery.

Three or four numbers down the list came another word, Map, which might have drawn a significant reply. The instantaneous association which it brought up, however, was Europe. After that came a succession of words, straight inventories of articles to be found in various rooms in the Morgan house, but they all drew blank. Never once was there a moment's hesitation.

So far our test proved, clearly and exhaustively, that, in his testimony at the inquest, our young man had meant to tell the truth. I was reminded of the doctor's words on the night of our return from the hospital, when he had warned me against falling into the error of thinking that the unlikely could not happen. His old theory of associative illusion, which had been made to look so fantastically improbable by our discovery of the cloak, was practically proven true in the very teeth of its improbability by this test of ours.

But who was the girl Harvey knew—the black-haired girl who wore a green cloak, with the collar cut high in the back? We were as far as ever from the answer to that question.

And so far as I could see none of his associates with the successive words in my list brought out anything of significance. Apparently we were drawing blank cover. At the same time, I was aware that something or other had made my chief extremely thoughtful. The way he was opening and shutting his hands and staring out of the window, the perplexed frown which knitted his brows, made it clear that there was only one link lacking in some chain of association of his own.

At last as I glanced at him in the half second interval between my word and Harvey's, I saw that he had got it; saw the sudden flare of excitement kindle in his eyes and his two clenched hands come down softly on the arms of his chair.

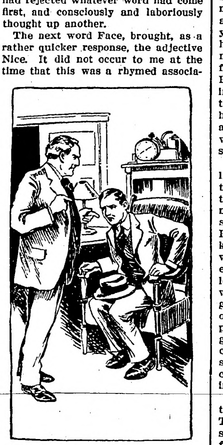
The next moment the word Dance in my list brought the unexpected association Policeman from Harvey.

At that the doctor rose and interrupted the test. "I think, Phelps," he said, "that those negatives of yours must be done. I'll go on and read this other list to Mr. Harvey."

The errand he had proposed to me was purely fictitious and the sheet of paper he held in his hand was blank; so I interpreted his interruption as intended for the mere purpose of giving him a chance to catechise Harvey along some new line without causing him to suspect the reason for the change.

To give color to the excuse, I left the room for a few moments, but it will be easy to believe that I returned as soon as I plausibly could. I found Doctor McAlister pronouncing a succession of words rather more rapidly than I had read them from my list, and the young man's answer had quickened, too, so that to the ear they were almost instantaneous. The words were a list of the features of the human face. Ears was the first one I heard, and its association, instantly, Coral; probably a reference to earrings, I thought. Eyes produced the adjective Black. Lips, ludicrously enough, brought the involuntary admission, Kiss. And at that our subject went flaming red. His perturbation was made perfectly evident the next moment, when he waited four seconds after the word Hand, only to produce the rhymed association, Band. Nothing could have been clearer than that, being on his guard against making another involuntary admission, he had rejected whatever word had come first, and consciously and laboriously thought up another.

The next word Face, brought, as a rather quicker response, the adjective Nice. It did not occur to me at the time that this was a rhymed association also; that somebody he knew pronounced it "fice." But that the doctor's mind had jumped to this conclusion was made clear when, for his next word, he himself gave out the word English.



There Was a Scared Look in His Eyes, but, Besides That, He Was Evidently Extremely Angry.

This got an answer, but not the kind of answer we were expecting. Our witness jumped to his feet, knocking over the little telephone before him, as he did so. There was a scared look in his eyes, but besides that, he was evidently extremely angry.

"Now look here," he said, "what business is it of yours whether I go around with Jane Perkins, or not? She's a respectable girl; she's a lady. What right have you got sticking your noses into my affairs?"

For myself, I was too much astonished by the result of the doctor's experiment to say anything. For that matter, my chief might as well have been silent for any effect his words had in calming the subject of our test. He wouldn't sit down. He wouldn't answer questions. He was through with us completely. This he made quite clear as he struggled into his overcoat and clapped on his hat.

"Well," said I when we were left alone, "I don't mind admitting that I'm rather behind the procession. We've discovered Jane Perkins, but who she is, or what she is I don't know. And I certainly can't see what gave you the clew that led you up to her so directly."

"Do you remember his association with the word 'sign'? It was 'Woodland.'"

"Yes," said I. "It struck me as curious."

"It struck me as rather more than that," said the doctor, "because I had an echo of the same association myself, and I spent ten solid minutes trying to place it. I suppose my difficulty came from the fact that it took me so close to home."

"Woodland avenue you mean?" I questioned. That was the street The Meredith was on.

"Closer than that," he said. "Do you remember our own corner and the street sign that marks it? It was pulled around diagonally and bent into a most disreputable angle as a Halloween prank two weeks ago. So the association was a perfectly natural one to anyone who, during the past two weeks, has been in the habit of frequenting our part of the town."

"But," said I, "how did you infer the existence of Jane Perkins from that?"

"Of course, that was only the starting point," he answered. "His whole train of associations made it evident that he had been 'going around,' as he said, with somebody. The place in the social scale occupied by that somebody was pretty well determined by the neighborhood of the street sign. It's quite the smartest part of town for blocks and blocks all around there, and it would be preposterous to assume that Will Harvey calls at the front door of any house thereabouts. The young ladies who use the front doors of the imposing residences in our neighborhood don't go to the sort of dances that would call up the association 'policeman' in any young man's mind. At any rate, it seemed a reasonable inference to me that our young friend had been carrying on a harmless flirtation with some housemaid. The scene of this affair was so far away from his own home, Jane Perkins was so utterly disassociated in his own mind from anything pertaining to the Oak Ridge mystery, that his naive description of the black hair and the green cloak of the woman whose silhouette he saw upon the shade becomes possible."

"Well," said I thoughtfully, after a little silence, "it's perfectly evident that we've done Harvey a service, although he isn't grateful for it just now. We've cleared him, to our own satisfaction at least. We've found an English housemaid named Jane Perkins. She is, no doubt, the girl of whom the profile on the shade reminded him. The next thing to do is to look her up, discover, if possible, whether she happens to possess a green cloak, with that particular kind of collar. It's likely enough, I suppose. There are probably hundreds of garments like that being worn in the city this season. In the department stores they make what they call 'specials' of those things, and sell them in hundred lots, all exactly alike."

The more I thought over the situation, the deeper my perplexity grew. The test upon Harvey had utterly destroyed my hope that we could get from him any clew to the identity of the strange, wild creature we had seen in the hospital. Instead, it had led us to a trig, snug, undoubtedly respectable English housemaid named Jane Perkins; and leading us to her, it left us face to face with a coincidence, or, rather, a series of coincidences almost incredible.

"Well," I resumed with a sigh, "there are lots of young women with black hair, and I suppose a good many of them wear green cloaks. But that a girl should have a profile like that of the extraordinary creature we saw in the hospital and later in Morgan's study—a profile like that and the same colored hair and the same sort of cloak, and still obviously a different person altogether, is rather disconcerting. Ashton at least would laugh at us if we told him we believed it."

"Yes," said the doctor, "Ashton would laugh. He laughs rather too easily, that young man."

Then, for the first time I looked long and searchingly into my old chief's face. His eyes were bright with excitement, his cheeks flushed and his big, restless hands beating out a triumphant tattoo upon the table top. He did not look like a man whose plans and theories had gone awry.

"There's something," I said curiously, "that I don't see yet."

"You will soon," he assured me, "before another day is out, unless I'm mistaken. Have a little patience."

There came a sharp knock at the door just then, and as it swung open, we saw Ashton standing there.

Use of Green Foods Common in All Ages

Lettuce is one of the oldest vegetables known and was eaten fully 500 years before the Christian era. Aristotle praised it highly. Spinach was introduced into China from Persia about 100 B. C., but was new to Europe in the Sixteenth century. Botanically, one of the most interesting products of the garden is the cabbage family. Kale, brussels sprouts, savoy cabbage, red cabbage, collards, kohlrabi, cauliflower and broccoli are all varieties of one species. Carrots were eaten by the ancients, but they were not very popular. Watercress, growing naturally in all north temperate regions, has been eaten as a salad since the Greek and Roman ascendancy and has been cultivated since the Sixteenth century. Peas were used by ancient Egyptians and others, but were not common food in Europe until the Eighteenth century. It is believed they were grown in the earliest American settlements. Thomas Jefferson recorded the growing of tomatoes in Virginia in 1781, yet it is said than an Italian could not persuade the people of Salem, Mass., to taste them in 1802.—Kansas City Times.

Wrote Immortal Music

Franz Schubert has been called "The Man of a Thousand Melodies," although the Etude, in writing of this, says that it is "a libel upon his enormous fecundity, because he might better be termed the man of 22,000 melodies." It is probable that no other composer of history produced so many themes, many of which are immortal.

St. Paul—Development of great areas in northern Minnesota for production of forest crops is the only solution for the delinquent tax problem, Professor H. H. Chapman of the federal forest service, said in a bulletin on the forest taxation inquiry now being made in the state. "The formerly forested area in northern Minnesota is approximately 19.000,000 acres," the statement says. "This lies largely in 16 counties. These figures reveal that for this region in 1925, 18.34 per cent of the surface was owned by farmers engaged in tilling the soil as compared with 86.84 per cent similarly owned for the rest of the state."

BARON CHALLENGED BY PARIS JEWELER

Rothschild, However, Laughed at Idea of Duel.

Paris.—A high society drama which led to Louis Cartier, the Rue de la Paix jeweler, challenging Baron Maurice de Rothschild, a racing man and member of the chamber of deputies, to fight a duel with him has caused a tremendous sensation in Paris.

In making up a list of guests for a dance that he was giving in his magnificent home in the Rue Monceau recently, Baron Maurice, who is a great-great-grandson of the founder of the famous financial dynasty, wrote down the name of Mme. Louis Cartier, who is one of the great Parisian beauties, but intentionally left out that of her husband. His social secretary made an error and sent the invitation to "Monsieur and Madame Louis Cartier," who were ignorant of the baron's real wishes.

"What are you doing here?" Baron Maurice asked M. Cartier as soon as he saw him.

"I am here because you invited me," M. Cartier replied sharply.

"You are mistaken," the baron insisted, while a number of guests stood listening to this conversation in amazement.

"Our invitation was addressed to 'Monsieur and Madame Cartier,'" M. Cartier declared hotly.

"Anyway, I don't want you here," the baron remarked and walked away.

Flushed with anger, M. Cartier called his wife, who was dancing at the time, and they walked out of the house, which threw a certain chill over the party. The first thing next morning, M. Cartier sent the invitation marked "Monsier and Madame" to Baron de Rothschild and at the same time he sent his card and two seconds, who explained that their friend wished to avenge his honor with swords, pistols or any other weapon the baron preferred, and asked him to name his seconds.

Baron de Rothschild laughed at the idea of a duel and the affair still hangs in suspense with all the upper crust of Parisian society anxiously waiting to see what will happen. He has just left Paris to take a month's cure at Marienbad, however, and the jeweler can do nothing except gnash his teeth until his opponent returns.

"No Learn Step on Gas," Say Old Indian Braves

Glacier Park, Mont.—The automobile will not entirely replace ponies among the Indians until the present older generation of braves has entirely passed away, according to the observation of Chief Two Guns White Calf of the Glacier National park reservation. He says that while the younger Indians take speedily to flivvers, their seniors never could learn automatic use of toe pressure on the gas feed, brake and clutch, since they had been too long in the reverse habit of "digging" their heels into the cayuse's ribs.

Boston Housewife Walks About Eight Miles Daily

Boston.—The average housewife walks eight miles a day in doing her day's work, according to the survey made here by the National Foundation for Foot Health.

The foundation survey showed that the number of trips the woman housekeeper makes up and down stairs during a day would more than equal climbing to the top of the Boston custom-house tower—approximately thirty stories.

California Astronomer Measures the Universe

Berkeley, Calif.—The sidereal universe, that vast expanse beyond the earth which provides an ethereal setting for a billion stars, is estimated to have a diameter of 194 quadrillion miles by Allan Douglas Maxwell, a James M. Goeway fellow in astronomy.

This computation is the result of preliminary studies concluded at the University of California Lick observatory on Mount Hamilton.

Maxwell's conclusions were reached in a study of the destiny of stars toward the edge of the sidereal galaxy in which the solar system is found. His computation was offered as a working supposition, which may be altered by further observations.

Peering into the heavens, he made his observations by means of the spectroscope in six areas in the Cygnus region of the milky way. The problem confronting Maxwell was to compute the distances of the fainter stars and to discover how far into space the cloudlike mass extended.

Maxwell is believed to have reached a greater distance from the earth than has previously been reached in the section of the sky he studied, with single stars as an objective. He successfully photographed the spectra of stars approximately 96,000,000,000,000,000 miles away. At that distance few stars were observable, and Maxwell believes the sidereal universe probably ends not far beyond.

NOT MANY NURSES OF CIVIL WAR STILL LIVE

Only 46 of 2,000 in Union Army Survive.

Washington.—Nurses who served in the Civil war, like the heroes to whom they ministered, are growing fewer as the conflict fades into history.

Of 2,000 nurses who served with the Union forces government records disclose the names of but 46 survivors. The list is admittedly incomplete, for it includes only those drawing pensions for their service. In Civil war time army records were kept less carefully than today. Many who served were not mentioned, or were listed only by first names which came to the attention of record keepers through some outstanding act of mercy or heroism.

Not a Profession Then.

Nursing was not yet a profession in the '60s. It was the need disclosed by the war, rather, which brought about the establishment of the first schools for training nurses. A great deal of the burden had to be borne by the Catholic sisterhoods. Hurriedly trained volunteers were also recruited.

Many of these had independent means, others who felt the need of pensions in later years were unable to establish records to meet the legal requirements.

Dorothea L. Dix, who served without pay, headed the government nurses, under an appointment which made her superintendent of female nurses. Many young and eager volunteers were rejected by her, but they found a place in the volunteer ranks. These included Clara Harlowe Barton, who later was to organize the American Red Cross, and Amelia Barlow.

The Confederacy acclaimed Ella K. Newsom, wealthy and beautiful widow who spent a fortune in her work, as "Dixie's Florence Nightingale."

The thinning ranks include some like Mrs. Wade McClellan, whose name does not appear in the pension records. She bore her first child at Gettysburg, Pa., during the battle there. A month later she entered the service of the Union as a nurse on the battlefields. Later she went to Emery hospital at Washington to serve. Now, at eighty-six, she lives in Carroll, Iowa, where she is active in the Woman's Relief corps.

Cornelia Hancock Best Known.

Of those on the pension roll probably the most widely known, judging from available records, is Cornelia Hancock, now at Atlantic City. She was trained at Philadelphia and ministered to the wounded at the front during the long campaign of the Army of the Potomac in 1864-65.

Some others on the roll and the states in which they reside include:

Illinois—Clarissa Crossman, Julia McCarthy, Irene D. Cook of Chicago; Addie Emery of Pontiac, Eliza Pyle of Norris City, Kate McLaughlin of Quincy, Mary C. Upton of Vera.

Indiana—Mary Brady of Indianapolis, Sister M. de Sales and Sister M. Paula of Notre Dame, Mary E. Miller of Logansport.

Wisconsin—Helen B. Cole of Sheboygan Falls.

Michigan.—Rena L. Miner of St. Charles.

Friends Redeem Goods of Bankrupt Farmer

Cedar Rapids, Iowa.—A friend in need is a friend indeed.

Peter Gulbrason, farmer, of Humboldt, had a demonstration of the truth of the adage recently.

Mr. Gulbrason had not prospered. There was a mortgage on everything he owned on his little farm and the sheriff had advertised a sale to satisfy creditors. Friends of Mr. Gulbrason heard of his predicament, and the day of the sale, they assembled on his farm and bought in his farm goods, paid off the mortgage and presented the paper to him.

He burned it in their presence and a happy group told Mr. Gulbrason to start life anew with their best wishes.

Spurned Parents' Plan, Now "Big Business" Girl

Charlotte, S. C.—Nancy Alexander spurned her parents' plan for her future when she decided to leave college and launch her craft into the stormy waters of business. She started out as a stenographer two years ago.

Today, at the age of twenty-one, she is in charge of a large northwestern lumber company branch here, with control of the business in North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, and Alabama.

Not only is she a full-fledged business women but she is an exponent of the idea a business office need not be in an office building. She has moved the company's office to her residence.

Stroudsburg, Pa.—The champion nonmixer is William Lacey. Caught in a big concrete mixer, into which he had crawled to make repairs, Lacey was whirled for three minutes in the contents of sand, water and cement, but escaped with some cuts and bruises.

Outdoor Stage

A new outdoor stage, equipped with lights, fountains and dressing rooms, has been built at Montpellier, France. It is a gift to the city from Auguste Bosc, now a Paris dramatist and theatrical manager, who was born and educated in Montpellier.

TO CROWN HIROHITO ON ECONOMY BASIS

Japan Will Keep Cost of the Ceremony Low.

Tokyo.—Preparations are under way for the great ceremonies to be held in Kyoto in November of 1928, when Hirohito, the young successor of the late Emperor Taisho, will be formally crowned as the ruler of Japan.

Committees are being appointed to take charge of the event and accountants are figuring out a coronation budget of several million yen which will be presented to the diet that convenes next spring.

Unlike the coronation ceremonies for Emperor Taisho, no special foreign envoys will come to Japan for the Hirohito accession. The Japanese government has requested the various nations not to send extraordinary representatives, as in the past, and it is expected that the ambassadors and ministers stationed in Tokyo will be delegated to attend in the extraordinary capacity.

The request that special representatives be dispensed with is said have been due to Japan's wish to economize.

The officials in charge intend to exert every effort to simplify the ceremonies in order that the least possible cost may be incurred. But even with the utmost economy it is feared that the Hirohito coronation expenses will be greater than those of the Emperor Taisho, which were approximately 10,000,000 yen, because general costs have increased.

A number of special carriages are to be built and blooded horses imported for the occasion. The music to be played during the various ceremonies is to be especially composed by both Japanese and European musicians.

The music to be played at the grand banquet following the coronation will be purely Japanese, the orchestra using flutes, harps, drums, gongs and other native instruments. At a subsequent banquet to be held later in the evening, the army and navy bands will play Western music exclusively.

Lift Ban on Yank Wives Seeking to Enter Cuba

Havana. — Regulations preventing women from visiting Cuba without permission of their husbands have been modified by President Machado, so far as Americans are concerned.

A stir was created when Dr. Santiago Canizares, commissioner of immigration, announced that under the terms of the original decree, women who did not have proper papers from their husbands would not be permitted to enter the country.

The decree was aimed at undesirable foreign women. It had never been used against an American until it was invoked against Mrs. Anna Joy.

As a consequence transport agents and a tourist commission drew orders from the secretary of the treasury that discretion be used in invoking the decree. President Machado guaranteed American citizens every facility within reason for landing here.

Child Pronounced Dead Awakens at Her Funeral

San Vicente, Argentina.—After being pronounced dead by a local physician, Vicenta Corozot, five, came to life three days later, the death certificate having already been issued.

Her eyes opened and she began to cry from the coffin around which a crowd of sympathetic friends and relations had assembled to assist in the funeral.

At the time she was pronounced dead, her distraught parents were not convinced but gave in after being sternly lectured by the officiating physician for doubting his professional word.

Forecasting Earthquakes

Leningrad—One hundred seismological stations are being built throughout the soviet union by the Academy of Science, which is undertaking to forecast earthquakes before they occur, in the hope of saving life and property. Professor Nikiforoff, a distinguished earthquake expert, is in charge of the work.

Housemaids of Paris Get Their "Rights"

Paris.—The Paris house servant is in a fair way to becoming spoiled. A labor contract just drawn up, signed and sealed, reads:

"The lady of the house engages herself to treat with all the desired solicitude her new domestique, Mademoiselle Emma. She will accord her two hours every day to go to her courses in clothes-cutting, stenography, piano playing and singing.

"Her wages will be 350 francs a month for the first three months, with an increase of 25 francs every month at the end of the fourth, up to the limit of 600 francs monthly. The new servant shall have the right to use the bathroom twice a week.

"Mademoiselle Emma will not be called by her first name, but 'Mademoiselle.'

"She must be aided by a chambermaid or char-woman, according to the needs of the household."

United States Ahead of World in Reading

Some self-confessed intellectuals question the high plane of the American's taste for reading matter but they cannot deny that the American reads more than the other peoples of the world. Government statistics disclose that there are 20,091 newspapers in the United States and that the country's book business last year was $130,000,000. The nation consumed 10,000,000 tons of paper last year. In face of these amazing figures none can complain that Americans do not read enough. If we don't all read classical literature all of the time we at least read and that is a healthful sign. A comparison of paper consumption reveals that more paper is required for the United States than for all of the rest of the world and that this country's consumption per capita is more than twice as great as that of the next largest user of paper.—Bangor Commercial.

"What is my present car worth in trade?"

OCCASIONALLY you hear a car owner say: "I'm going to buy such and such a new car because the dealer has offered me the best deal on my present car."

But without understanding the economics of trade-in transactions, you cannot be sure that the largest allowance offered means the best deal for you.

These are basic facts:

1 Your present car has only one fundamental basis of value; i. e., what the dealer who accepts it in trade can get for it in the used car market.

2 Your present car has seemingly different values because competitive dealers are bidding to sell you a new car.

3 The largest allowance offered is not necessarily the best deal for you. Sometimes it is; sometimes it is not.

4 An excessive allowance may mean that you are paying an excessive price for the new car in comparison with its real value.

5 First judge the merits of the new car in comparison with its price, including all delivery and finance charges. Then weigh any difference in allowance offered on your present car.

Remember that when you trade-in your present car you are after all making a purchase, not a sale. You are simply applying your present car as a credit toward the purchase price of a new car.

Hunting in Canada

We have heard of the fine big-game hunting in Canada, in a general manner, but never did we realize what a keen sport it was until Elmer Hagglund told us about a moose-hunt he had last Fall. Elmer moved from here to the Peace River country, Alberta, in 1921, and is now farming on his homestead three miles from Sexsmith, Alberta. He writes:

"I must tell you about my moose-hunt. One day I went out and ran across two moose. I thought they were too far away, so I moved closer, but they saw me, and away they went.

"I saw where I had made my mistake. Next time I went out I ran across two again. I shot at one and hit him, from where I stood, but he didn't come down. I kept on going, and finally got another shot at him. Still he didn't drop.

"I had him badly wounded by now, and he couldn't run fast, so I kept after him. I got another opening, then I emptied my gun at him, and he laid down.

"I thought, 'Before I go any closer now, I'm going to reload my gun.' I got down on my knees and put some shells in my gun. When I looked up, there he was standing up again!

"I up and shot, and down he went. I thought, 'Now I'll have to go over and bleed him'; but I was a little afraid because he might not be quite dead, and might paw me. So I went slowly toward him, and when I got close enough, I saw——

"I had two moose laying there instead of one!

"When I was re-loading my gun, the other moose had come in sight, so I shot him and thot it was the first one."

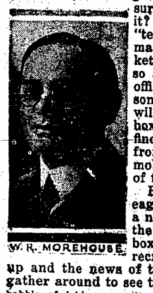
THE HIDDEN KEY--AND OTHER FAKES

By W. R. MOREHOUSE

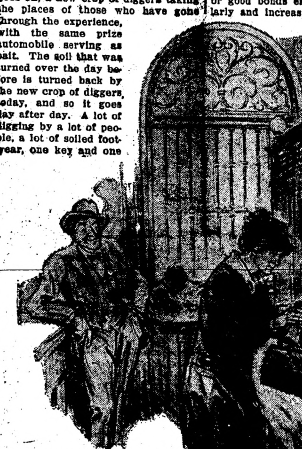
Public Relations Commission, American Bankers Association



W. R. MOREHOUSE

HAVE you ever gone hunting for the hidden key—a key hidden by real estate dealers in order that you among hundreds of others might be given the exercise of tearing up the surface of some new subdivision looking for it? Talk about wild turkeys tearing up the "terra firma," they haven't anything on man. A new subdivision is put on the market. Public interest in the tract is needed, so a key that will open a box in the tract office is hidden beneath the earth's surface somewhere in the tract. This hidden key will open the box in the office and inside the box the lucky finder of the hidden key will find a valuable prize. It may be anything from a diamond ring to an order for an automobile. A new automobile stands in front of the office and presumably it is the prize.

Picture in your own mind hundreds of eager searchers digging over the surface of a newly born boom subdivision, looking for the hidden key—the key to the big surprise box. About the time the diggers have been recruited to several hundred, the key shows up and the news of the discovery breaks. Soon the diggers gather around to see the mysterious box opened. Imagine the babble of joking remarks, some sarcastic and some expressing disappointment, as the grand prize is found to be a $100 certificate good as part payment on a lot, and not the new automobile. Day after day the hunt goes on, a new crop of diggers taking the places of those who have gone through the experience, with the same prize automobile serving as bait. The soil that was turned over the day before is turned back by the new crop of diggers today, and so it goes day after day. A lot of digging by a lot of people, a lot of soiled footwear, one key and one automobile, but an unlimited supply of $100 certificates. Just another scheme to catch a lot of "suckers."



Investigate Before Drawing Your Money Out of the Bank.

Nearly every person possesses the gambling instinct to a more or less degree. The truth is, the average American is more or less inclined to take unnecessary risks. In the realm of money making many are ready to take a long-shot chance in order to strike it rich, if possible.

Knowing the inclination of the average American to gamble, irresponsible schemers lie awake nights plotting as to the best way of arousing the gambling instinct of the investor, and when this has been done they proceed to fleece him out of his cash. By using various "baits" these get-rich-quick promoters are usually successful, especially among persons who are inexperienced in making investments and who neglect to investigate before they invest.

You can't get rich by dealing with promoters of the wild-cat type, but you can quickly lose what capital you have already saved. The road to the poorhouse is worn deep by the feet of persons who have dealt with irresponsible promoters and not by the feet of those who have a savings account or good bonds earning interest regularly and increasing in value day by day. The signing of your name on the dotted line of some trick contract, or the drawing of your check payable to some sharp real estate or other promoter, or the turning over of your cash, may spell financial ruin for you.

As a safeguard against losing your cash reserve, leave it in the bank until you have made a thorough investigation, which you can do without cost to you if you will consult your banker, or write to the National Better Business Bureau, New York.

Each day discloses new victims of some crooked scheme. Old schemes having lost their effectiveness as a result of exposure have given way to new schemes to defraud. The new schemes are even more deceptive than the old forms. Fractional-share schemes, territorial-rights schemes and co-operative land ventures are reaping a harvest for present promoters. Because so many new schemes are being formulated is another reason why you should investigate before you invest.

The following were entertained at the Paul Olson home Saturday afternoon: Mrs. Jacob Nelson, Mrs. R. A. Holmgren, Mrs. John Hagberg, Mrs. R. A. Werner, Mrs. A. T. Hagen, and Joe Nelson.

A Communication

Holt, Minnesota,
Sept. 20, 1927.

To the Editor of the NEWS:

Opponents of the new ditch, No. 36, seem to think that we are trying to run the flood waters of Marshall and Beltrami counties onto them. This would be next to impossible as there is a six mile watershed between the new ditch and the Thief river, the outlet for the drainage systems of Marshall and Beltrami counties.

We ask all opposed to the new ditch to make a full and impartial investigation of its cause and effect, before condemning it, and we will gladly assist their committee in doing this work.

My home is the fifth house on the west side of the road, two miles north of the Holt creamery.

Respectfully,
C. A. DAVIS

Some opponents of the new ditch, north of Holt, seem disposed to stir up a political feeling or opposition against county officials who are faithfully trying to do their full duty in this matter.

Intimidation (which is just another name for bullying) is mighty poor argument, and shows the weakness of any cause which tries that method.

We have great respect for the official who does his full duty in the face of opposition.

FARMER WOMAN IN OKLAHOMA

Praises Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Because It Gave Her Health and Strength

In a sunny pasture in Oklahoma, a herd of sleek cows was grazing. They made a pretty picture. But the thin woman in the blue checked apron sighed as she looked at them. She was tired of cows, tired of her tedious work in the dairy. She was tired of cooking for a houseful of boarders, besides caring for her own family. The burdens of life seemed too heavy for her failing health. She had lost confidence in herself.

One day she began taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and her general health began to improve. She took it faithfully. Now she can do her work without any trouble, sleeps well and is no longer blue and timid.

This woman, Mrs. Cora Short, R. R. 9, Box 387, Oklahoma City, Okla., writes: "Everybody now says: 'Mrs. Short, what are you doing to yourself?' I weigh 135 and my weight before I took it was 115. I have taken seven bottles of the Vegetable Compound."

Other women who have to work hard and keep things going may find the road to better health as Mrs. Short did, through the faithful use of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

The GREEN CLOAK

By YORKE DAVIS

WNU Service. Copyright. 1926

STORY FROM THE START

Dr. Ronald McAllister, psychologist, undertakes to solve the mystery of the murder of a recluse, Henry Morgan. The dead man's papers reveal that he had been in New Zealand, where McAllister had lived in his youth. Will Harvey testifies to seeing a woman in a green cloak at the Morgan home the night of the murder. Doctor McAllister is asked to see a young woman patient in a hospital. In her delirium she mutters in a strange language which only McAllister understands. He suspects she may know something of the murder. A carefully hidden map is discovered by McAllister and Assistant District Attorney Ashton in Morgan's home. While they are searching a young woman enters the house in the darkness and escapes, leaving behind a green cloak. The name of Jane Perkins, a housemaid, is brought into the case and McAllister believes he has a clue.

CHAPTER VI

After our conversation with Ashton in the morning, which had terminated with a practical declaration of war, on our part, upon him, his visit to our laboratory took us rather by surprise. I think, perhaps that he intended it that way, and that there may have been lurking in the bottom of his mind the idea that by coming upon us in that unexpected way, he might surprise some secret we were holding back from him.

"Well," he said cheerfully in answer to our greeting, "I just met Harvey coming away from here in Mallory's convoy. I suppose with such an array of instruments as this," he waved his hand to include pretty much everything in the room, "you've succeeded in getting the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth out of him. How about it? Is he innocent or guilty?"

His mockery was perfectly good-natured, but the depth of his skepticism made it possible for Doctor McAllister to be perfectly frank with him.

"He is innocent," said he. "He had no more connection with the Oak Ridge murder than you had."

"He says so himself, I presume," observed Ashton.

"Exactly," replied the doctor.

The telephone bell rang just then and I answered it. I heard a voice from somewhere inquiring if this was Doctor McAllister's laboratory, and on my answering in the affirmative, the voice asked if Mr. Ashton had arrived yet.

"He's here now," I said. "Do you want to talk with him?"

Then I turned away and called Ashton to the phone. As he started across the room my chief spoke to him.

"I see an evening paper sticking out of your pocket," said he. "Let me have a look, will you, while you are at the telephone?"

Ashton handed it to him, then crossed the room and picked up the receiver.

The doctor beckoned to me. For the moment he seemed very little concerned with the news, for he turned the front pages rapidly, until he came to the lost and found section in the classified advertising. Once there, his eye pounced, like a hawk, upon the item he wanted. His long bony finger pointed it out to me:

"Found—A green cloak. Owner can have same by identifying and paying cost of this insertion."

"I wonder if that bait has brought any nibbles this afternoon," the doctor whispered.

Then, before I could reply, he gripped my arm tightly, and nodded toward Ashton.

"A woman, you say" . . . I heard him exclaim with every appearance of excitement. . . .

"Did she identify it?" . . .

"What sort of woman? Anything unusual about her?"

There was a little silence while he listened for the description. Then in an incredulous tone we heard him exclaim:

"An English housemaid! And she gave her name as Jane Perkins! Did she identify the cloak beyond a doubt?"

. . . .

"What address did she give?"

. . . .

"What's that? Three—seven—0 Woodland! Why, you idiot, that's my own address! That's The Meredith. And you let her walk off with that cloak over her arm after she had given you that address!"

He waited for no answer, replaced the receiver on the hook, with a jerk, and whirled around upon us, his face red with anger.

"Gentlemen, don't you think you have carried this joke a little too far?" he demanded.

I suppose the unwarranted accusation might have made me angry if I had had leisure to indulge in such an emotion. But all my other feelings were swallowed up in astonishment. That one additional detail supplied by Ashton's conversation over the telephone stretched an already hardly credible coincidence to the breaking point. Jane Perkins not only had a green cloak with a high collar, but she had lost it; and seeing it advertised as found, had promptly gone and identified it, and had gone away with it over her arm. But the address—well, I admitted to myself, that reduced the whole thing to a farce.

For a moment all my belief in Doctor McAllister's theory, in the validity of the test we had performed upon Harvey, in every scientific law I had felt surest of ten minutes ago, tottered on its foundation. Some one, somewhere, in placid security from our suspicions, and from the possibility of our detection was directing this ghastly farce and was permitting himself to laugh at us. That girl in the hospital had been shamming; Harvey had been shamming; Jane Perkins, who had identified the cloak, was, perhaps, a myth altogether. I could imagine whoever played the part laughing, as she walked away with that cloak over her arm, and picturing the effect upon all of us when we should learn the address she had given.

But to the district attorney the situation had a very different look. He had no doubt at all—and on second thought I could not blame him—that we ourselves were the center of a plot to make him look ridiculous.

I got the shock of another surprise when I turned to look at Doctor McAllister. Instead of the indignant rebuke which I expected him to mete out to the young man who had just accused him, he spoke very quietly and with a mocking twinkle in his eye.

"You can't expect me to pass my opinion on a joke, Ashton, until I hear it," he said.

"You know altogether too much about it already," said the attorney hotly. "This precious Jane Perkins of yours answers my advertisement for the cloak which you turned over to me. She identifies it, beyond any doubt, as anyone whom you had instructed in advance would be able to do—identifies it down to a missing button and a patch in the lining. How far back does the joke go? Did you find the cloak as you pretended you did, in Oak Ridge, near the Morgan house, or was the finding of it part of the game?"

A little gesture of rebuke and protest from the doctor checked him very abruptly.

"No, I withdraw that," he said. "That was an unwarranted thing to say. I believe that up to this morning, when you declared war upon me, you thought that by instructing the woman to give my own detective my own address as hers you were giving me a fair chance to detect the fraud. It would be, I suppose, if this were a game of chess. But this is serious business."

"We realize that as well as you do," I started to say, but my chief interrupted me.

"Can't you penetrate our fraud a little further?" he asked, and his tone now was openly derisive. "Does it occur to you that Phelps here, with the addition of a skirt and a shawl, might not be a sufficiently plausible Jane Perkins to deceive the astute gentleman you left in charge?"

There was a little pause there, for Ashton was too angry to answer.

The doctor's manner changed as he went on. "What Phelps says is true. We realize better than you do, I think, what is at stake here. We're not trying to thwart justice in the long run. We are attacking this problem in our own way, after giving you fair warning. We refused to guarantee that our way would not conflict with yours, and we told you, in so many words, that you'd do well to keep an eye on us. You've the law on your side. You've all the power of the state attorney's office, whereas we have no standing at all. If you think we've got the cloak, search us; search the laboratory. Where will you begin?"

Still too angry to make any reply, Ashton strode out of the room, not actually slamming the door after him, but shutting it decisively enough to suggest that he felt like slamming it, and the next moment we heard his motor chugging away down the avenue.

The doctor hurried to the window and looked out after him. Presently he turned toward me with a long breath of relief.

"We're all right so far," he said. "He's gone straight on without turning the corner. He isn't going back to The Meredith just yet. Come along. We'll have no time to lose even as it is. Ashton will have cooled down by dinner time, and when he's cool enough to let his mind begin working again, he'll become dangerous."

Already he was struggling into his overcoat. I turned to go to the other room for mine, when he called me back and sent me to the telephone.

"I think we had better have a taxi," he said. "It'll save some precious time and will enable us to take some of our traps up to the hotel with us."

"Traps?" I inquired. "Some of our instruments, do you mean?"

He nodded. "The chronograph and telephones," he said. "I fancy they'll be all we'll need for any real test we shall want to make, but it will be well to take something else for the purpose of diffusing attention. Here, this piece of heavy artillery will just serve the purpose. It's rather cumbersome, but that makes it all the better."

The instrument he indicated was one I had never seen before, it having come in only that day from the model makers. The doctor was always devising new instruments of one sort or another. This one looked interesting, and I should have questioned him about it had not my mind been so full of other things.

"You'd better telephone at once," he concluded. "If this sleet storm keeps up, the wires are likely to be down before night."

Both of us, I think, would have been a little surprised if we could have known how true that prediction was and how vitally it was going to concern us.

"You are going to make some tests up in our rooms in The Meredith?" I asked.

"I imagine," he said soberly, though his eyes sparkled with excitement as he spoke, "I imagine that our rooms will be about the only place where we will be secure from interruption. I could see it in Ashton's eye that he meant business, and I'm pretty sure that if we attempted to come back here after dinner and bring anybody with us, our little party would sustain a rude interruption."

All the while he spoke, he was busy gathering things together, and as soon as I had finished telephoning, I helped him. Haste spoke in every movement he made, and it was not long before I was thoroughly infected with his excitement, although I had only a vague idea what it was all about.

Not until we were seated in the cab, with a suitcase full of instruments at our feet, did he say anything that tended to clear up any part of the mystery.

"It was a great piece of luck," he observed then, "we were able to send Ashton away in such a rage. It won't occur to him for some time, to begin making inquiries about The Meredith."

"You mean," I exclaimed, "that the address four—seven—0 Woodland avenue was given in good faith, by a real Jane Perkins, who is actually employed there?"

He only laughed and told me to wait and see; but the inflection of his voice and the eager expectancy in his eyes made it clear that that was what he did believe.

"But," I protested, "even if it were possible to imagine Jane Perkins as having any possible connection with the crime, it is inconceivable that she would go and risk answering the advertisement in order to reclaim the cloak and then give her own address."

He vouchsafed no word of explanationtion or argument, but I could see that my objection had not shaken him in the least. So, perforce, I waited with what patience I could assume to see what would happen when we reached The Meredith.

The doctor turned over our bag to a hallboy, with instructions that it be taken to our apartment. Then he led the way straight toward the dining room. It was barely six o'clock, a full hour earlier than we usually dined, and the room was almost empty.

"It won't entirely destroy your appetite to sit down to dinner in tweeds, will it?" he asked. "We really haven't time for frivolities of that sort this evening."

Broken Heart Cause of Pyorrhea Attacks

According to Dr. Hans Sachs of Berlin, one of Germany's most eminent dentists, the jolts of life and worries loosen teeth and are the real cause of pyorrhea. Keep your soul in snug comfort and harmony, he says, and your teeth will be free of the modern plague of pyorrhea. Doctor Sachs has devoted the last ten years to the study of the influence of psychological factors on teeth, says the Pathfinder Magazine. He believes that pyorrhea develops most easily in teeth affected by tartar.

"I have established through a series of tests that under strain of emotion and worries tartar settles on teeth much more rapidly than under normal condition," he claims. "Another cause for pyorrhea is gnashing of teeth, especially when asleep. Psychoanalysts know that gnashing of the teeth is only a reaction of the subconscious mind trying to free itself of burdensome impressions of daily life. Consequently, here, too, is a psychic cause leading to pyorrhea. Most pyorrhea patients belong to the depressive type discovered by Freud. Take the depression away and the pyorrhea will improve. It may sound foolish to laymen, but there is no doubt that a broken heart may cause pyorrhea and the subsequent loss of teeth."

Origin of "Horse-Radish"

In the names of plants and fruits the word "horse" is frequently used to denote a large, strong or coarse variety. For instance horse beans are a coarse variety of common beans used in feeding horses and cattle. It is supposed that the word was originally used in "horse-radish" for the same purpose; namely, to indicate what was regarded as a coarse kind of radish.

Shakopee—Sale of three farms in Cedar Lake township in one day, involving nearly $50,000, was reported here. John Novak, Jr., sold 64 acres for $9,500; William Novotny received $14,000 for 80 acres, and John P. Campion, $23,000 for a 160-acre tract.

Minneapolis—330 Minnesota men and women, members of the American Legion and its auxiliary, left on two special trains for Quebec, where they will board a ship which will carry them on their way to the Paris convention.

St. Paul—Goodhue county carried away the honors in the county booth exhibits, with a display which featured the cheese production of the county. Dakota county was second in the sweepstakes with a display of garden products.

Minneapolis—Mrs. W. I. Nolan, wife of the lieutenant governor of Minnesota, died at the Nolan residence. Mrs. Nolan was born in Rochester, Minn., 54 years ago and became the wife of the lieutenant governor at Osceola, Wis., in 1894. She was the mother of nine, seven of whom are living.

St. Paul—Steadily increasing use of the air mail and passenger line between the Twin Cities and Chicago was shown in the August report issued by the Northwest Airways, Inc. During August, the eleventh month of the organization's existence, passenger business increased 35 per cent and the air mail [illegible] per cent over July.

Argyle—Marshall county has more farms embracing 1,000 or more acres than any other county in the state, according to recent figures from the United States census bureau. The total acreage of farms of the class is shown to be 30,045. Kittson county ranks second in this respect, followed by Polk and Mahnomen counties.

Minneapolis—More than half a billion dollars in certificates of indebtedness and treasury notes will be offered to the public during September it was announced by Ogden Mills, acting secretary of the United States treasury, according to a statement of the Federal Reserve bank of Minneapolis.

Wadena—Thomas Keefe, former Twin City resident and once a candidate for governor and once for United States senator, died at a hospital at Wadena, following an operation. He was 53 years old. Mr. Keefe was defeated by former Governor J. A. O. Preus for the republican nomination for governor in 1920.

Minneapolis—Movement of grain from northwest harvest fields now is approaching its peak, with receipts in Minneapolis more than 31 per cent larger than last year at this time and railroads reporting daily loadings as much as two and a half times as great as in the early days of last September.

Minneapolis—The C. C. Webber docked in Minneapolis with the second tow of barges sent into the northwest by the Inland Waterways corporation. The Webber brought six barges up the river from St. Louis as far as Prescott, Wis., where the tow was split and brought to the Twin Cities in two sections.

St. Paul—The prosperity of America is linked inseparably with the prosperity of agriculture and it is inevitable that the farmer's problems will have their effect on commerce and industry in general, Governor Howard M. Gore of West Virginia told members of the Minnesota Farm Bureau federation in an address at the fair grounds.

St. Paul—Minnesota leads the country in potato production, according to a bulletin from the federal department of agriculture. Minnesota's production from 1920 to 1925 was 61,080 carloads of 600 bushels each. New York was second with 60,872 carloads; Maine, third, with 54,367; Michigan, fourth, with 54,243, and Wisconsin, fifth, with 49,044.

St. Paul—Claims of the state of Minnesota against the United States which run back 65 years are to be prosecuted by C. P. Diepenbrock of Red Wing and Clarence W. DeKnight of Washington, acting for the state. The two attorneys believe there are considerable sums still due the state on account of expense incurred in raising and equipping troops in the Civil war, and in suppressing the Sioux outbreak of 1862.

Rochester—All the scientific learning of 25 distinguished British surgeons, who came to Rochester to inspect the Mayo clinic during a tour of American medical centers, failed them when they were confronted with American sweet corn on the cob. At a dinner given here before the visitors and their wives departed for the east, one of them confessed to his host that the entire party's knowledge of sweet corn eating technique was only 48 hours old

Boy, 13, Proves Self Champion Detective

Detroit, Mich.—Twenty-three arrests in just three days is a record any experienced detective, wise in the ways of the lawbreaker, might covet. To a lad of thirteen years who seldom meets violators outside of story books such a record is attained only in the wildest of dreams.

Jack W. Worden, thirteen years old, refused to be daunted by precedent, and in three days caused the arrest and conviction of nineteen Highland Park merchants for selling meat on Sunday and four peddlers for giving short weight.

Jack declares he inherited his sleuthing ability from his father, John W. Worden, who for thirteen year has served the city of Highland Park as a policeman. Worden, now a captain and sealer of weights and measures, gave Jack his chance to search for lawbreakers and Jack made good in short order.

All of the merchants arrested on the evidence gathered by Jack were convicted and fined from $5 to $25 each.

MARRIAGE HOAX ENDS BY SUICIDE

Pitiful Drama of a Wife of a Few Days.

Birmingham, Ala.—In the office of the clerk of the northern division of the United States court of Alabama, at Birmingham, the word "nol-prossed" is written after the name of Mrs. Mary Rhodes Elliot on the court docket. In the writing of this word the story of a pitiful drama of a wife of a few days is told.

Mrs. Elliot was arrested some time since, charged with using the United States mails to defraud. Shortly after her arrest she committed suicide.

All the pathos of a blighted life had been hers. Born a hopeless cripple, no man had ever loved her enough to ask her to be his wife.

Then she advertised in a magazine for a husband: "A southern girl with $50,000 needs only to share her wealth to make her happy." To possess the luxurious articles which a girl with this much money would own, she ordered them from a mail-order house.

Donald E. Elliot answered her advertisement and married her, after he visited her at her home at Arab, Ala. Soon afterward she took her own life.

To her husband she left a note of farewell. This is filed in the office of the clerk of the Federal court in Birmingham, along with the indictment against her.

Girl Bride Spurns Mother on Street

Pitman, N. J.—A girl bride of fifteen chose to stick to her husband of a day rather than return to her mother, who met the elopers in a dramatic street scene on Broadway.

The principals are Lawrence Reemel, twenty-seven years old, and his wife, formerly Marion Stowe, fifteen years old, and the latter's mother, Mrs. Marion B. Stowe.

Reemel and the girl tried to elope to Elkton. They failed, but went to Chestertown, Md., and had the knot tied.

Mrs. Stowe threatened to have Reemel arrested. She traced the pair to Woodbury. They were not there when Mrs. Stowe arrived and she continued on to Pitman, where the couple came to stay with friends.

"I love you dearly," exclaimed the mother as she embraced her daughter. "Come home with me."

The girl bride wept. She said she loved her mother, but that she loved her husband, too.

"You'll have to make your choice between him and me," declared Mrs. Stowe.

"I'll stay with Lawrence," sobbed the bride.

Swarm of Bees Gives Horse a Merry Chase

Berlin.—A swarm of bees tried to cluster on the tail of a horse harnessed to a light butcher wagon in front of a butcher shop here. The horse proceeded to entertain an excited but helpless mob for at least ten minutes with some samples of wild-west bucking. The frantic animal succeeded in freeing itself of the wagon and galloped madly down the avenue.

Meanwhile the fire brigade was called out. It started in hot pursuit with the hose assiduously spraying the horse's hindquarters whenever the spraying was good. After the chase continued for half a mile the bees were driven away and the completely exhausted horse was corralled.

Favors Husband

Wilkesbarre, Pa.—A wife who attends public dances against the wishes of her husband need not be supported by her husband, Judge Fine ruled in the Domestic Relations court.

Parson Fined

Carlisle, Ark.—Rev. E. H. Owens has been fined $5 on a charge of whipping his sixteen-year-old daughter for talking to John Lowe, to whom she was secretly married.

Handicapped

A certain big-game hunter, who was contemplating a trip to Africa, called at a sporting goods store and bought a large quantity of cartridges.

"I usually deal with your head office," he remarked to the man in charge. "But I dare say you will be able to send these for me?"

"Certainly, sir."

"Well, I want them to go to Nigeria."

The other looked blankly for a minute or so, then:

"I think you'd better give the order to our head office, sir," he ventured. "You see, we've only a small boy with a bicycle here."

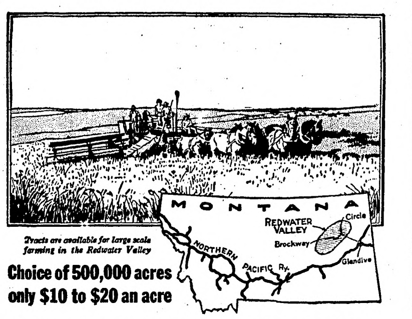
MONTANA'S RICH REDWATER VALLEY OPENED BY NEW RAIL LINE



Tracts are available for large scale farming in the Redwater Valley

Choice of 500,000 acres only $10 to $20 an acre

RAPID development of the great farming country in the Redwater Valley of Southeastern Montana is seen in the opening of 1,000,000 acres by a new branch line of the Northern Pacific Railway running 63 miles from Glendive.

Here the Northern Pacific will sell direct to farmers a half million acres, obtained from the U. S. Government, at prices ranging from only $10 to $20 an acre, with 20 years to pay. Taxes are extremely low—only 10 to 16 cents an acre. Special advantages are available to neighbors and colonies desiring to settle together.

Diversified or mixed farming is successful throughout this area. Corn has increased by hundreds of thousands of acres in the last few years in Southeastern Montana. Hog production has grown rapidly. All classes of livestock are raised. The dairy industry is getting a good start.

Communities already are established. Churches have been built. Schools are open. There is progress ahead. With the coming of the railroad markets will be closer. More farmers will come in. Land values will increase.

The Northern Pacific Railway will help farmers in getting started right. Settlers are wanted who seek a real chance for themselves and their families. The Northern Pacific will send a representative to talk the matter over, if desired. Investigate this opportunity. Let us send you booklets, prices and easy payment plan. All sent free.

Never in the history of centrifugal cream separators has there been a machine equal to the De Laval. Each model has, in its day, been far ahead of all other machines in skimming efficiency, ease of operation and superior durability.

The present model De Laval is the crowning achievement of all. It has the wonderful new self-centering bowl which runs smoother and easier, eliminating vibration and thus making the separator still more durable.

You will get a richer, smoother, higher-testing cream with this new De Laval—and more of it, too. Best of all, your old cream-wasting separator will be accepted as part payment—no matter what its age, make or condition. Bring it in and we will arrange a "swap" so that your new De Laval will actually pay for itself while you are using it.

Home Again

YE Editor and family arrived home Sunday evening after a month's vacation in South Dakota. While there they visited at the home of the editor's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Ole Hanson of Huron, S. D., and many other relatives located at different points in the state. They also had the opportunity to see the President and Mrs. Coolidge and their son John while there, and heard the President speak for an hour when he dedicated a large new library erected on the South Dakota college campus at Brookings, S. D., in memory of Abraham Lincoln. This is the only college library in the United States dedicated to Lincoln.

On the way home the Editor and family visited with friends at Flandreau, in the southern part of South Dakota and from there entered good old Minnesota south of Pipestone and journeyed north homeward bound with stopovers at Bellingham, where they visited at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Elmer Borchardt and at Glyndon where they spent a night at the home of Mr. and Mrs. R. A. Holmgren and family. The crops in South Dakota and southern Minnesota were very good this year and the editor and family enjoyed seeing them and many other sights on this trip.

Turkey Thieves Afoot

It will be a good policy for the turkey raisers to count their turkeys in the evenings now before going to bed. Turkey thiefs are already out on foot, horseback and some even use big trucks to rob the farmers of their birds at night. We suggest that those who have turkeys keep a good shotgun or rifle loaded to the brim and put in a handy corner to use as a logical weapon in greeting these night prowlers.

Ditch Delegation

WHEN we left for South Dakota about a month ago, we said that if we got the chance we would confer with President Coolidge about different things.

Well, we were too busy, and the President left for Washington a short time after we arrived there.

The only way we can see out of it now is to let that great ditch delegation at Argyle go to Washington and see Coolidge in this matter.

THURSDAY October 6th at the Community Hall

An Open Letter to the Editor

From the President of General Motors

LAST SPRING I wrote you that my belief in the country newspaper had led us in General Motors to decide to advertise our products together in the small-city press of the country.

The returns from the series of the messages recently published have justified that faith; and we shall continue to advertise in your community through your newspaper this fall.

It occurs to me, however, that some of your readers may be asking: "What is General Motors?" and "Why is General Motors?" These are fair questions and I should like to answer them as frankly as I can.

General Motors was organized some years ago on the theory that a group of large companies, working together, could render a better service than they could separately. In this we simply applied to industry a principle that is as old as civilization as regards the human family and human progress.

Original members of the General Motors family were Buick, Cadillac, Chevrolet, Oakland and Oldsmobile, together with the Delco-Light Company and other well-known companies manufacturing automotive equipment. By joining together their resources, we were able to establish great Research Laboratories, a 1245-acre Proving Ground and the GMAC Plan of credit purchase; to effect vast economies in purchase and manufacture and distribution; to assure and maintain the quality of every product in the General Motors family.

Has the General Motors family principle proved itself in practice?

The best answer, I think, is to compare the Chevrolet, Buick, Cadillac, Oldsmobile and Oakland of today with the models of five or ten years ago.

Then add Pontiac, a General Motors creation. Add LaSalle, another General Motors creation. And then consider how General Motors has developed these cars into a complete line, within which any family may find a suitable quality car at the price it plans to pay: "A Car for Every Purse and Purpose."

Another example is Frigidaire, the electric refrigerator. General Motors had the resources to spend millions to develop a satisfactory refrigerator, and then to apply to its manufacture the same processes which have increased the utility and lowered the cost of the automobile.

We believe that this record justifies General Motors as an economic institution. Its products are quality products, first of all. Their prices represent the economies of united effort passed on to the purchaser. In the last year one in each three automobiles chosen by the public has been a General Motors car. The service of Delco-Light electric plants has extended to more than a quarter million homes, while Frigidaire has become the world's largest selling convenience of its kind.

We believe also that the values now offered in the current General Motors products (which are listed below) prove anew that "many minds are better than one" and that a family of companies, working together, can produce results which are decidedly in the public interest and of increasing benefit to the individual family.

Very truly yours,
Alfred P. Sloan, Jr., President

STORY FROM THE START

Dr. Ronald McAlister, psychologist, undertakes to solve the mystery of the murder of a recluse, Henry Morgan. The dead man's papers reveal that he had been in New Zealand, where McAlister had lived in his youth. Will Harvey testifies to seeing a woman in a green cloak at the Morgan home the night of the murder. Doctor McAlister is asked to see a young woman patient in a hospital. In her delirium she mutters in a strange language which only McAlister understands. He suspects she may know something of the murder. A carefully hidden map is discovered by McAlister and Assistant District Attorney Ashton in Morgan's home. While they are searching a young woman enters the house in the darkness and escapes, leaving behind a green cloak. The name of Jane Perkins, a housemaid, is brought into the case and McAlister believes he has a clue. In response to an advertisement of the finding of a green cloak, a young woman, giving her name as Jane Perkins, housemaid at The Meredith, claims it. McAlister takes two laboratory instruments to The Meredith for an undisclosed purpose.

And yet his manner when he took the chair that Wilkins placed for him, and glanced over the menu card suddenly became leisurely and deliberate. He had a little chat with Wilkins, taking the advice of that gastronomic expert as seriously as if a good dinner were the only subject that he felt the slightest interest in just then.

The waiter got our order at last and went away with it to the kitchen, and Wilkins himself, with a grave inclination of the head, started to move away, but the doctor called him back.

"I wonder, Wilkins," he said, "whether you can find out for me if there is a chambermaid named Jane Perkins employed in the hotel."

The man shot a quick look of surprise into the doctor's face, a look quite at variance with his ordinary stiff immobility.

"Yes, sir, there is such a young woman working here," he said. "It happens that I am acquainted with her personally."

"Ah," said the doctor in a tone of satisfaction, "that simplifies matters. I might have known that you would be able to help me. Wilkins, it happens that I very much wish to have a little conversation with that young woman."

Wilkins inclined his head gravely, without a word.

"You'll arrange it for me, won't you?" said the doctor. "I'd like to have her sent to my room immediately after dinner."

There was a momentary silence after that. Both of us looked up in some surprise that the man did not answer. His face was unusually grave.

"I beg your pardon, sir," he said with a little hesitation; "I hope you'll forgive the liberty, but I have, as I was saying, something of a personal interest in that young woman. I hope she's not in any difficulty, sir. I hope that she has not been doing anything that she shouldn't have done."

"I'm inclined to think not," said the doctor, "but unless I am mistaken, she's in a difficulty."

Wilkins said nothing, but his silence was expectant. He was too well trained to ask any questions, but it was very evident that he wanted to know more.

"I think I may venture to be frank with you, Wilkins," the doctor resumed. "Of course what I say is between ourselves, and I want your promise to say nothing of it to the young woman in question."

"Yes, sir; certainly, sir."

"In the investigation of the Oak Ridge murder the other night a certain green cloak was found, which in the state attorney's office, is believed to have been worn by an unknown woman who committed that crime. That cloak was advertised as found, in the afternoon papers, and was almost immediately claimed and identified beyond a doubt by this Jane Perkins, who gave The Meredith as her address—"

"She didn't do it, sir," Wilkins interrupted quickly. "I'm sure she can't be guilty of the crime of murder. She's a very quiet girl, sir—a good girl."

"I have made a little investigation of that mystery on my own account," said the doctor, "and I'm inclined to think you're right. I should, however, be glad to have some better founded reason for that opinion. There are certain circumstances which point at her directly enough to bring her under serious suspicion and to make her a good deal of trouble. If Mr. Phelps and I can convince ourselves, in advance, of her innocence, we will gladly do all that is within our power, both in representations we will make to Mr. Ashton and otherwise, to shield her."

"That's very good of you, sir," said Wilkins. "I'll see that she's sent up to your room the moment you have finished dinner."

There was another little silence; still Wilkins kept his place beside our table. Presently, after a little apologetic cough, he spoke again.

"It strikes me, sir, that it might, perhaps, be as well if the young woman were not to know that she was to be questioned. If she is innocent, it would only fluster her, and if she is guilty, it would give her time to prepare herself. If you wish, I will arrange to have her sent to your apartments, instead of the regular chambermaid who works upon that floor, to prepare your bedrooms for the night. In that way she'll suspect nothing."

The doctor glanced at him shrewdly. "That was a very able suggestion, Wilkins. Thank you for making it."

"Not at all, sir," said Wilkins.

"For the present," the doctor concluded, "you will remember that you are to say nothing of this conversation to anyone, either to the other people in the hotel, or to—Mr. Ashton."

The Man Shot a Quick Look of Surprise Into the Doctor's Face.

"Certainly not, sir."

The arrival of some other people in the dining room called him away just then, and we did not see him again until we were half through our meal. Then, looking up, we found him standing, silently, in his old place.

"The matter is arranged, sir," he said to the doctor. "The young person is at her own dinner just now, but she'll go up to attend to your rooms in about half an hour."

"Very good," said the doctor. "We can have our instruments ready by that time."

At the word "instruments" the man started, and, looking up, I found him regarding the doctor with a queer, half-frightened expression.

"Speaking of instruments, sir," he said, stammering a little, "there isn't going to be any mesmerism, or—"

The doctor interrupted him with a full-voiced laugh. "No hocus-pocus whatever, Wilkins; no black art, no clairvoyance, or anything of that sort. The instruments I speak of simply serve the purpose of a stop-watch, and the test is a perfectly simple, straightforward one."

Then, seeing that the man was still not entirely convinced, he added, "You can be present yourself, if you care to be."

"That's very good of you, sir," said the man. "On the young woman's account I will be glad to come, if you can wait until I can leave the dining room. That will be about eight-thirty, sir. I'd be sorry to keep you waiting, but she might be alarmed at any sort of test, and she has a good deal of confidence in me, sir."

"Very good," said the doctor, "only don't come up to the room with her. Follow along later, on some errand or other, and we'll call you in. Perhaps we'll make a little demonstration on you in advance, just to give her confidence."

A look of decorous amusement appeared on Wilkins' face.

"That will be very interesting, I'm sure, sir," he said. As he bowed himself away I could see that he was still smiling.

"It's curious," I observed to the doctor. "We've seen that man daily since we came here to The Meredith to live, but I got an absolutely new impression of him this evening. It never occurred to me before that when he laid aside his professional manner he might be a thoroughly human, kindly old chap, with as many affections and concerns as any of us, and with, perhaps, about the same opinion of our reality as we have always had of his."

"We'd better get on," said the doctor, suiting the action to the word. "We haven't any time to waste."

As we walked over toward the elevator Wilkins preceded us and rang the bell for us, just as he always did. I had it my tongue's end to make some reference to our engagement with him for a little later in the evening, not that it was necessary, but simply because it was more natural to say, "In half an hour, then," or something of that sort, than merely to nod and answer his good night. I think he must have perceived that intention, certainly he checked it by looking, just then, a little more wooden and professional than ever. I understood when I glanced over his shoulder and saw that Ashton had just come in. He was not looking our way. Whether he had made a point of not looking, I do not know; but I was glad that I had not blurted out, in his hearing, any reference to the unusual and highly unprofessional sort of engagement that the doctor and I had with Wilkins.

"A rather remarkable man," said I, as we stepped into the elevator.

The doctor nodded.

A few minutes later, in the doctor's spacious sitting room where we had set up our instruments and now sat waiting for the arrival of the subject we meant to test by them, we heard a rap at the door.

"No timidity about that," observed the doctor in a whisper; "and no effrontery, either. A plain, common-sense, professional knock. Let her in, will you, Phelps?"

It was with a mounting excitement that I crossed the room and laid my hand on the knob, for there, on the other side of this door, was one of the elements of our mystery. What would she prove to be? Another innocent person, tangled by pure chance in the spider's web of circumstance which surrounded our mystery; or would she turn out to be, herself, one of the spinners of the web?

When I opened the door I got, instantaneously, a very good view of the girl, for the sitting-room was brightly lighted and the little entrance hallway where she stood comparatively dark. And that first look of mine brought a disappointment, there was no doubt of that. I had not known exactly what I had expected Jane Perkins to be like, but something different from this, certainly. The whole look of her as she stood there, an appearance so pervasive that it baffled analysis, was of stolid stupidity.

Her eyes were dull, her cheeks a very dark red, so that as I looked at her first I suspected a perfectly reckless use of cosmetic. Of course the standard I compared her by was the wild girl in the hospital, for, upon the doctor's theory of Harvey's testimony, that wild girl's profile had reminded him forcibly of this English housemaid. There was a crude sort of resemblance between the two faces—the heavy brows and lashes, the black hair and general contour of the features. Indeed, the thing that occurred to me as I stood there was the ridiculous futility of written descriptions of faces, when the same description would include two people whose general air and appearance were so diametrically different.

I found it impossible to describe the wildness and curious unearthly distinction of that other face; I found it as difficult to analyze the tameness, the commonplace banality of this one. And yet, seen in silhouette, they might look a good deal alike.

Birds to Be Classed as Master Builders

Birds are the most perfect builders, and—strange as it may sound—there is scarcely a trade that you will not find represented among these feathered craftsmen.

Many of the nests of American birds are marvels of ingenuity but their greatest efforts pale beside the wonders of the tropics. Weavers, carpenters, tailors, plasterers, tunnelers—these are but a few of the many trades that we find practiced when the nesting season arrives.

The sand-martin and the kingfisher, both belong to the guild of tunnelers, and are content with a burrowed hole. Ducks, gulls, water hens, and corncrakes are all primitive builders, with no ideas beyond a rough and scanty collection of materials loosely thrown together on the ground.

The house swallow is a plasterer, employing as his building materials nothing more than mud, but out of this he contrives to erect a nest that is wonderfully strong, and put together with neatness and care.

The singing thrush uses more varied materials, a mixture of clay, cow manure, and moss, but well and truly laid, and forming a splendid home for the young birds.

Milk Is Indispensable

Communities in the United States and Canada would "save expense and serve their nutritional needs best if as much as one quart of whole milk were used as food by each member of the population," according to the report of the committee on nutritional problems, American Public Health association, as submitted to the milk and milk products reasearch bureau. "Milk is indispensable to the steady growth and development of children," the committee reported.

Suicide Wave Grips Students in Turkey

Constantinople.—As a measure against a wave of suicides, especially among young students, the new chief of police, Cherif Bey, has promulgated an order prohibiting the press from giving extensive publicity to suicide cases.

Henceforth pictures of the victims may not be published nor may suicide stories appear on the front page of any Constantinople paper.

All that is to be allowed will be a brief statement in case of suicide on an inside page.

The most conspicuous tragedy in Angora was the suicide of a sixteen-year-old schoolgirl, Nihal Hanem, daughter of a prominent army officer.

SMALL BOY FORCED TO STAY IN KENNEL

Child Found Tied to Stake, With Dog Companion.

Greensburg, Pa.—Strapped to a stake to prevent him from wandering away, four-year-old Charles Garland was housed in a dog kennel for two weeks, it was revealed with the filing of a complaint, charging cruelty, against Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Steinman, who live near Grapeville, Westmoreland county.

Roy Hallam, humane agent, found the child, suffering from exposure, in the kennel in the back yard of the Steinman home. A dog was the child's company.

Investigating, Hallam found Mrs. Tillie Lovell, the child's mother, in the Steinman house. Mrs. Lovell said her husband had deserted her six months ago and she returned to the Steinmans, to whom she is related. They gave shelter to her and her three-year-old son, Henry Lovell, but refused, she said, to have anything to do with the Garland child, her son by a former marriage. The Steinmans forced her, she said, to keep the elder boy strapped to the post and would not permit her to bring him into the house. The boy had no attention aside from water and food she was able to carry him surreptitiously, Mrs. Lovell said.

Race Against Death Won by Fishermen

Wildwood, Fla.—A race with death was won by fishermen who reached shore in time to save the life of a companion in whose hand had been imbedded a deadly poison spine from the whiplike tail of a deadly stingaree.

The victim of the dreaded fish was Charles Falk of Wildwood. Falk, employed aboard a fishing boat, was bailing out nets that were heavily laden.

He and others would draw nets over the side so that fish poured upon the deck.

In that way a stingaree was shaken from the seine and as it went through the air it lashed out its whiptail, burying the spine, as deadly as the fangs of a rattlesnake, deep into the engineer's hand.

A tourniquet was applied and twisted tight with a belaying pin, and full speed was made for the fishing pier.

Members of the crew assisted Falk ashore and then pressed into service the automobile of one of the anglers on the pier and raced to the hospital, where prompt treatment prevented further spread of the poison.

Sleeping Man Slain by Dynamite Charge

Mauch Chunk, Pa.—Joseph Benedictine Bulat, thirty-five, said to be wealthy, was killed when dynamite was exploded under him. The explosive was concealed under a lounge on the front porch of Bulat's home at New Columbus, and a fuse was laid from the outside of the house. Bulat was lying on the lounge and was decapitated.

No theory has been advanced by the police for the explosion.

Old Horse Kills Man Leading It to Grave

Atlantic City, N. J.—A sixty-eight-year-old farmer, Henry Ang of Linwood, was kicked to death by a thirty-two-year-old horse, which he was leading to the grave he had dug for it. The horse kicked Ang in the stomach.

Dr. Charles C. McNulty of Atlantic City had just pronounced the period of the horse's usefulness at an end. This was the first time the animal had been out of his stall for several years.

Two Deaths Over Trifle

San Francisco.—Warren C. Smith, sixty-five, deputy sheriff at San Leandro, near here, shot and killed Edward A. Hayne, thirty-six, in a quarrel over ownership of a log on the beach, brought in by the tide. Smith then committed suicide, shooting himself.

Small Cut Causes Death

Paulsboro, N. J.—Patrick Deloughrey, a rigger at work on top of the Vacuum Oil company's plant here, cut himself slightly, fainted at the sight of the blood and dropped 80 feet to his death. He was twenty-two years old and had been married only a few weeks.

MRS. BASSETT ALWAYS TIRED

Now in Good Health by Using Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Lansing, Michigan.—"I have taken Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound whenever I needed it. When I first used it I was so bad I could hardly walk across the room without crying. I was tired all the time. I think my trouble was coming on me for six months before I realized it. I read of your wonderful medicine in the paper, and * * * my husband bought me a bottle, and after the first few doses I felt better, so kept on taking it until I was well and strong. I take it at times when I feel tired and it helps me. I will always have a good word for your medicine and tell anyone what good it has done me. I recommended it to my neighbor for her girl, who is sixteen years old, and it was just what she needed. She is feeling fine now, and goes to school every day."—Mrs. E. F. Bassett, 216 South Hayford Avenue, Lansing, Michigan.

Do not continue to feel all run-down and half sick when Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is sold by druggists everywhere. It is a root and herb medicine and has been used by women for over fifty years.

Feel Stiff and Achy?

To feel constantly lame and achy is too often a sign of sluggish kidneys.

Sluggish action permits waste poisons to remain in the blood and is apt to make one languid, tired and achy, with dull headaches, dizziness and often a nagging backache. A common warning that the kidneys are not acting right is scanty or burning secretions.

Assist the kidneys at such times with Doan's Pills. Since 1885 Doan's have been winning friends the country over. Ask your neighbor!

THE POT OF POSIES

(© by D. J. Walsh.)

MIRA WESTON emerged from the office of Todd & Son, realtors, just as the five o'clock whistle was blowing. She was tired, depressed and unexpectant. Lights were on and the street, banked with new snow, was singularly attractive. But Mira was in a hurry to get home. It was the night her sister Lucy went to the "movies" with her husband, and Mira was supposed to appear at the very instant the biscuits were ready to be taken from the oven. When she reached the other side Mira found herself facing the window of the town's one florist shop. It was radiant with potted hyacinths in full bloom. She paused involuntarily.

Spring beckoned from the window and Mira, the weary, paused for a clearer look. She loved hyacinths so deeply that she would not have hesitated to have sold both loaves of bread as a great philosopher advised to buy a jar of that fragrant beauty. Hyacinths meant more to her than the mere fact that they were lovely flowers; they embodied a memory, a romance, a wistful association. Long ago she had stood beside a row of hyacinths in her mother's tiny flower plot and said good-by to the one man she had ever cared about. He had promised to come back—but he never had, and she had ceased to look for him. Her mother had died and she and Lucy had gone to a big town to earn their living. Lucy had married and Mira lived with her.

She could not resist the hyacinths, so she went in and bought a pot of the palest pink ones. A high wind met her as she returned to the street. Hugging her parcel, she tucked her cold chin into her fur collar and forged along. As she turned her own familiar corner she collided with a man. The shock of the impact jarred the pot from her arm and it fell with a crash.

"I'm very sorry!" the man exclaimed, and stooping down he gathered up the wreck.

"It was my fault," Mira returned, taking the parcel from him. From it arose the fragrance of perishing beauty.

At that instant the wind caught the man's hat from his head. He sprang after it and Mira sped on, anxious to save her own hat from a similar fate.

"You are ten minutes late," Lucy said as her sister entered. Lucy was stout and rosy and practical, a direct contrast to the slim, pretty and shadowy-eyed Mira.

"I stopped to buy a posy, but here is all that there is left of it," Mira said, opening the parcel. "I had an accident with it."

She took off her things and sat down to supper. She was not hungry. The pink hyacinth bloom rescued by Lucy leaned from a tiny vase in the center of the table and reproached her with its ruined loveliness. It was only a little thing that had happened but, added to a great deal else, it imposed upon Mira an unsupportable weight. She thought of Will Kelly as she had not thought of him in months. She thought of herself getting old—and getting nowhere. Even Lucy, wedded to the dull and unattractive Fred, was happier than she. But then Lucy had never had a romance before she met the man she married.

"I kept you waiting, Lucy: I'll do the dishes," Mira said.

Lucy hurried to change her dress, for the first show began at 7. They were gone by the time Mira had the dishwater in the pan.

The telephone bell rang and Mira went to answer it. A familiar voice boomed in her ear, the voice of Horace Lasher who had that day bought another piece of property of Todd & Son. Horace already owned a string of tenements but his purchase consisted of a large house with a porte cochere and garden. He had said something to her that made her think he had her in mind as a possible mistress for the big house. His wife had been dead a year and it was said he was looking for another.

"I'd like to come up and see you this evening, Mira," he said.

Mira hesitated though imperceptibly. If she let Horace come he would understand naturally that she was willing to accept his attentions. And she wasn't willing, especially tonight with this memory of Will trailing her with peculiar insistance.

"I'm sorry, Mr. Lasher," she began, "but——"

"I'd like to come, Mira."

She tried to think of an excuse. She had none, save that invariable one that she did not want him. He sensed the meaning of her faintly uttered objection.

"All right, if you don't want me." He laughed coolly. "I'll go over and see Mrs. Peters, I guess." He hung up.

Mira stood very still, her face burning. Mrs. Peters was the lively widow whose house Todd & Son had just sold. She had gone to board with a friend. It was the end of Horace Lasher as far as she was concerned. He would never be able to get away from Mrs. Peters. She wondered if she were a fool. Lucy would call her so. No need longer to toil in that dingy office, wearing out what was left of her youth. And she was not particularly happy with Fred and Lucy. She had given up all this for a mere memory.

She moved over to the table and bent over the broken hyacinth. Its perfume came up into her face. She could shut her eyes and see that flower pot of her mother's and Will Kelly, who hadn't come back.

Again a bell rang, the doorbell this time. Mira went into the cold little hall and opened the door. A man stood there with something done up in paper held within his arm.

"Does Fred Peck live here?" he asked, peering through thick glasses. Mira went white. In spite of the glasses and all the other changes in his appearance she was sure that her memory had come to life.

He couldn't believe it was she—just at first.

"My sight is so poor," he said. "Has been ever since I came out of the big fuss. I got laid out, you know. That's why I didn't come back. I—I wasn't sure, Mira, you'd want to see such a wreck as I was."

"As if that would make any difference," Mira said rosily. She had taken the parcel he gave her and found it contained a pot of pink hyacinths. "Oh, Will, you remembered!" she breathed.

"Oh, yes, I remembered. But I'd never have had the courage to have come here tonight if it wasn't for a little thing that occurred soon after dark. I was walking along when I ran into a woman and knocked something she was carrying out of her hands. I smelled hyacinths and—and it all rushed over me irresistibly. I said to myself: 'I'll go and see her before I leave town anyway. You see, Mira, though I'd got your address from old Mrs. Horton back home and had come here on purpose to see you, I'd given up the idea and was going away without letting you get a glimpse of me. I—hated to have you see me like this. But the smell of these posies—well, I thought about it a while, then I got my offering, and here I am."

Mira laughed tenderly.

"You poor boy! It was I you banged against—my pink hyacinths you shattered. And neither of us knew the other! Though there was something in the sound of your 'I'm very sorry' that—that—well, I've been thinking about you ever since I reached home."

A happy pair sat by the gas log talking when Lucy and Fred returned.

"Why, William Kelly! Where did you come from?" Lucy screamed. "And what are you doing here?"

"Ask Mira," Will answered. "Mira has generously consented to share my life. She's a fool, isn't she, Lucy? Even though I can," his voice broke between a laugh and a sob, "'support her in the style to which she has been accustomed,' as the jokes say."

Lucy put her hand on his shoulder. Her eyes misted.

"No, Mira isn't a bit of a fool. I'd do the same thing myself," she said unexpectedly.

Architects at Work to Eliminate Noise

Noise not only affects health but causes a large loss to business through the distraction of attention. A noisy environment means the use of more energy in talking. Night noises cause a loss of sleep. Conversation on a railway train or in the subway requires an expenditure of more than 100 times as much energy as in a quiet room.

Soon noise producers will be banned completely. Even the work of dictating an article like this to a typist using a noisy machine means more of a drain on the energy of the author than he realizes. In a short time architects, in designing buildings, will no more think of neglecting to consider sound-absorbing measures and devices than they will provisions for adequate supplies of heat and water.

Street and subway cars will have noiseless wheels and coupling connections. In office and factory every machine from typewriter to drill will operate in comparative silence. Some rooms will be flat, or dead, but in auditoriums, churches and theaters the aim will be to preserve rather than to reduce resonance.

As a result, office routine will be accelerated, human energy conserved, costly mistakes reduced and the human body released from its present use as a sound shock absorber.—Floyd W. Parsons in the Saturday Evening Post.

He Meant Right

A professor of systematic divinity in one of our best known divinity schools became indisposed and could not conduct his classes. A notice to that effect was given after morning chapel. Whether the professor who posted the notice belonged to the old school fundamentalists or to the newer school of scientific investigators is not known, but here is a copy of the notice he posted:

"The professor, being ill, requests me to say that the seniors can keep on going through purgatory, and the middle class continue the descent into hell until further notice from the professor."—Boston Globe.

When Sweden's crown prince visited this country last year he was a guest of Secretary of State Kelogg in Washington. The prince was so well pleased with the cooking at the Kelogg home that he had the Swedish parliament vote the cook, Mrs. Lydia Bungener, a gold medal. Mrs. Bungener has just received the medal with a complimentary letter from the prince and is the proudest woman at the nation's capital.—Capper's Weekly.

Podigal Kitten Returns

Five years ago Tiddles, the nine-months-old kitten belonging to F. D. Davies of Farnham, England, disappeared. It was mourned for a while, then forgotten. Recently a hungry and tired black-and-white cat appeared at the door of the old home. It was not recognized until it finally did some of the tricks learned in kittenhood. Then Tiddles was given milk from the fatted cow.

Dismantling Landmark

Gilbert Michaelson is this week dismantling the big lumber shed in this village, better known as the old Hanson & Barzen lumber yard. According to reports that have reached the writer, the old lumber yard is about one of the oldest in Holt.

Mr. Michaelson purchasd the building some time ago and will use the material in building a barn on the Guy Anderson farm east of town, which he bought from Mr. Anderson last fall.

Business Is Doubled Here For Local Association

The Holt Co-operative Livestock Shipping Association shipped two carloads of livestock to Saint Paul on Saturday. They also shipped two the week before instead of one, as we reported, and will ship two this week. This goes to show that the association is having a substantial increase in its business. The association has had a good run since it was organized last winter, having shipped a carload of stock almost every week.

Conference Held Here

Car Overturns

While driving home from town last Monday afternoon, Emil Ostlund had the misfortune to overturn his car into the ditch on the road east of the Ellestad farm. Mr. Ostlund was alone, and for some reason turned to look in the rear seat for something, when the car left the road. The car was damaged to the extent of a broken windshield and a smashed top.

Elected President

The W. C. T. U. met at the S. Lorentson home on Monday evening and while in session elected a new president for the local unit to succeed Mrs. Racine Olson, who moved to Thief River Falls recently. Mrs. Peter Hanson was chosen president by the members of the local unit.

We are in receipt of a letter and money order for another year's subscription for the NEWS from Emil Prushek at Detroit Lakes, Minn. He states that on account of poor health he had to give up school work for one year at least, and is now busy in assisting in managing the Detroit Lakes Nursery.

The 1927 chicken season closed here with very little shooting of these birds being reported. The chickens were very scarce in this locality this year and it will require a lot of protection for them in order to increase in number so as to make good hunting when the next open season rolls around.

We don't know what President Coolidge is going to do when he gets out of office but our guess is that if he moves on a farm he will be able to make it pay without much help from Congress.—Exchange.

The program commenced on Wednesday and will close tonight after a three days session.

TO MR. BABCOCK

In the proposed trunk highway construction projects for 1928 and for which bids will soon be called, we failed to notice any construction work on T. H. No. 32 between Holt and Middle River in this county. This is one of the most crooked roads in the state and is extremely dangerous to every motorist. The road has been surveyed and new locations planned. Come on Charley Babcock, fix that road up before you have the entire northwester part of the state after you.

The Green Cloak

STORY FROM THE START

Dr. Ronald McAlister, psychologist, undertakes to solve the mystery of the murder of a recluse, Henry Morgan. The dead man's papers reveal that he had been in New Zealand, where McAlister had lived in his youth. Will Harvey testifies to seeing a woman in a green cloak at the Morgan home the night of the murder. Doctor McAlister is asked to see a young woman patient in a hospital. In her delirium she mutters in a strange language which only McAlister understands. He suspects she may know something of the murder. A carefully hidden map is discovered by McAlister and Assistant District Attorney Ashton in Morgan's home. While they are searching a young woman enters the house in the darkness and escapes, leaving behind a green cloak. In response to an advertisement of the finding of a green cloak, a young woman, giving her name as Jane Perkins, housemaid at The Meredith, claims it. McAlister takes two laboratory instruments to The Meredith for an undisclosed purpose. The head waiter, Wilkins, admits Jane Perkins is employed at the hotel.

"I was sent up here to do up the bedrooms, sir," she said. "Was there any mistake about it, sir?"

I realized now how "face" and "nice" had suggested a rhyme to Harvey. She pronounced the word, "mistike," in the vilest cockney.

"No, it's quite right," said I. "Come in."

Doctor McAlister let her go straight through into the bedrooms with no more than a glance at her, and a nod in her general direction.

"Well," he said, "how about it? Does the resemblance strike you?"

"I don't think it would have struck me had I not been looking for it. But I imagine if we could get silhouettes of those two faces and put them side by side, they'd look a good deal alike."

He looked at me rather oddly, turned away and paced the length of the room a couple of times. It was one of his incongruous and unexpected characteristics that he liked to whistle or hum popular tunes to himself when he was thinking in an abstracted way. He began to do it now, though it was no popular tune which his fancy alighted on; indeed, it took me a minute or two to identify the queer, chanting cadence which he hummed over and over again. I did not identify it, in fact, until he left off humming and began to sing, and then the guttural words he used gave me the clue. It was that ghastly death chant we had heard the girl in the hospital droning and mumbling to herself.

Presently he strode over to the mantelpiece. There was a large ornamental, narrow-throated vase at the end of it, and the doctor began tapping idly enough upon the side of it with a little pearl-handled pocket knife. I turned round in some surprise.

"That sounds as if it were full of water," said I.

"It is."

"Well, who in the world can ever have thought of putting water in that vase?"

"Who, indeed?" he said.—"Oh, look here, will you, Phelps? I've dropped my knife into it."

It was curiously unlike him to do an idle, clumsy thing like that, quite as unnatural as that the vase, which had never held a flower, should be full of water. But suddenly something in his face told me that the thing he had done was part of a carefully calculated trick.

The next moment he called out, "Perkins—"

"Yes, sir," came the chambermaid's voice from the next room. "Coming, sir."

As she entered the room he turned to her and indicated the vase. "I've just dropped my penknife in there," he said, "and my hand is too big to go in through the throat of it. Do you think you can fish it out for me?"

"My hand isn't as small as some, sir," she said with fat good humor, "but, anyway, I can try."

"Hold on!" the doctor cried as she moved her hand toward the vase. "The thing is full of water. You'll get your sleeve wet."

I was standing close by waiting to see what would happen, still utterly at a loss for a guess as to the doctor's purpose.

The girl slipped back her sleeve and plunged her arm into the vase.

And I, unable to believe what my eyes had seen, clutched the doctor's shoulder and stared, astounded, into his thoughtful face. For high up on the girl's forearm, just inside the elbow, was a tattoo mark in red and blue—a mark that I had not forgotten.

CHAPTER VII

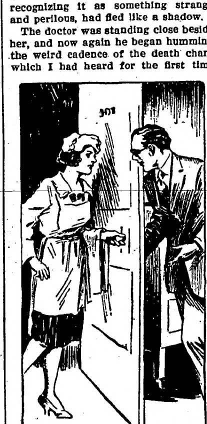
It was fortunate that she did not once look into my astonished face, because for the first few moments I had no control of it at all, and to any eye, even a stupid one, it would have betrayed strange matters. At first I simply stared at that mysterious little tattoo mark in red and blue; it seemed as if I could not pull my eyes away from it. But at last, rubbing my hands over them, I looked up at the doctor, astonished, questioning, incredulous, and yet convinced.

Of any such momentary turmoil his own face showed absolutely no sign. It was calm, almost to the edge of indifference, but his bright old eyes met mine for just an instant with a flashing look that admonished me of the necessity for self-control.

I pulled myself together, turned away for just the space of one deeply indrawn breath, then turned back again for a look at the girl. She was bending over the vase, her hand plunged down to the bottom of it, where she was fishing about for the doctor's knife. She was evidently a good-humored sort of person, easily pleased. The doctor's pretended mishap and her own efforts to retrieve it, seemed to be providing her with genuine amusement. She smiled and giggled and chattered all the while she was groping around for the knife, and uttered a triumphant exclamation when she found it.

All of that I barely saw, for I was searching, too, searching her face with a concentrated gaze that would have astonished her had she encountered it. As I looked, in the light of my new knowledge of her, the physical identity of her features with those of the wild girl became steadily more apparent, until I was forced to marvel at my previous blindness to it. Physically the face was the same; but everything of bone and flesh, every infinitely subtle muscular strain or relaxation about lip, eyelid and brow, everything which makes of the human face a window through which the soul looks out—all of that was different. Her movements were different. Sensory and motor nerves must be keyed to an altogether different pitch. The deep, stable color in her cheeks told of a pulse that beat at an entirely different rhythm. I remembered the poise of her body the last time we had stood face to face with her there in Henry Morgan's study, her attitude of frozen alertness, the deep breath drawn in through the dilated nostrils. She had caught our scent then and, recognizing it as something strange and perilous, had fled like a shadow.

The doctor was standing close beside her, and now again he began humming the weird cadence of the death chant which I had heard for the first time from the girl's own lips. He hummed it through once in a reminiscent sort of way, and then began singing the words.



"I Was Sent Up Here to Do Up the Bedrooms," Sir," She Said.

The girl looked up at him and burst into a peal of laughter.

He stopped abruptly. "What's the matter?" he asked.

"I beg pawdon, I'm sure," she said. "I couldn't help laughin'. That was such a funny lot of noises."

"Is my singing as bad as that?" he asked good-naturedly.

"Not the singin', sir; the noises that went with it."

"Oh, you mean the language. Didn't you ever hear that language before?"

"Do you call that a language sir? Does it mean anything? Do people talk like that?" Then she went on, without a pause, "I beg your pawdon for bein' such a rattle, sir. And here's your knife."

She wiped it on her apron and laid it on the center table; then wiped her hand and started to pull down her sleeve.

"That's a curious bit of tattooing on your arm," the doctor commented. "How did you come by it?"

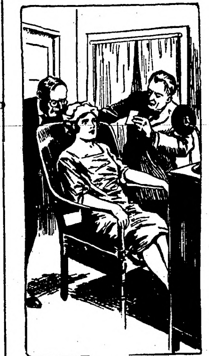
"I don't know," she replied indifferently. "It's always been there, I fancy; ever since I was too small to remember anyway. I hope your knife won't get rusty, sir. And I hope you don't mind my laughin' at that bit of song you sang."

"Not a bit," said the doctor. "I don't wonder the language struck you as queer. Yet it was common enough down in the quarter of the world where I was born."

"And where might that be, sir?" she asked.

"Oh, I meant the South Pacific generally. Where I lived was in New Zealand."

"Fancy now!" she said, obviously pleased. "That's where I come from myself—Wellington, New Zealand, but I never heard that language."



"I Don't See Anything but a Spot of Yellow Light."

"No," he said; "you'd have to go a matter of a thousand miles or two from Wellington to hear that; it's Maori."

"I never heard of him. Is that all, sir? Shall I do up the rooms?"

He nodded; but as she turned to leave the room he called her back.

"You're rather near-sighted, aren't you, Perkins?" he said.

"Oh, no, sir; quite to the contrary, in fact. I can see farther than most people."

"Did you ever have your eyes tested?"

"Measured for glasses, do you mean, sir?" she asked. "No, sir. I sha'n't never come to them."

"Sit down in that chair a minute," said the doctor, with an easy assumption of authority. "No, not that one; this big chair here. I want to see if your eyes are as good as you think they are."

The chair he indicated, and in which she rather reluctantly seated herself was deep and soft and heavily upholstered. Neither the doctor nor I enjoyed sitting in it, however, because the curve at the back thrust one's head forward at an unnatural angle.

"Lean back," commented the doctor, "all the way—so."

When she was seated to his satisfaction, he wheeled the chair around with its back to the table, and then adjusted the powerful electric reading lamp so that it shed a beam horizontally above the girl's head.

She surveyed these preparations a little uneasily. "It's like having a tooth pulled," she said.

"Not a bit," said the doctor cheerfully. "It's not going to hurt. I only want you to look into this little mirror and tell me what you see."

He held it up before her eyes as he spoke. It was circular, slightly concave and was adjusted upon a long ivory handle. He held it above her head so that she had to strain her eyes upward to see it at all, and at such an angle that it reflected the light of the reading lamp straight into her eyes.

"I don't see anything at all but a spot of yellow light."

"You only see one?" questioned the doctor.

He pulled out his watch and glanced at it. "Don't mind what I'm doing," he admonished her. "Look steadily at the little mirror. Let me know how long it is before you begin to see two of those spots."

Famed in History as Warrior and Builder

Among the most important monarchs who governed a mighty civilization centuries before Athens came into fame was Seti I, a great warrior and a great builder, who ruled Egypt not long after the death of Tut-ankhamen. Rameses I, founder of the nineteenth dynasty of Egypt, ruled only two years and was then succeeded by his son, Seti I. The young ruler took up the task bequeathed to him by his father of leading his conquering armies into Asia. He marched to Lebanon and compelled the Syrian princes to cut down some of the famous cedars for his triumph. He overran the Philistine country, marched through Palestine and shattered the Amorites. He also had conflict with the Hittites of Asia Minor, but little is known of his wars with them. Seti's military achievements, however, were not as great as his building ability. His temple at Abydos and his galleried tomb in the Valley of the Tombs of the Kings stand out as among the most amazing architectural triumphs devised by mind of man.—Detroit News.

MINNESOTA BRIEFS

Northfield—Enrollment at St. Olaf College has reached a total of 964, which is already past the total on the corresponding date last year, according to the statement of George O. Berg, registrar.

Madison—The Minnesota Valley Association of Congregational Churches opened its fifty-fourth annual meeting here with a large representative attendance from churches all over the district.

So. St. Paul—Weighing fees on cattle and calves at the South St. Paul livestock market will be returned to the scale in effect prior to June 1, 1924, Frank W. Mattson, railroad and warehouse commissioner, announced.

Stillwater—Bids were called by Herbert W. Austin, state purchasing commissioner, for the construction of the new $250,000 cell block to be erected at Stillwater prison. Accommodations for 200 prisoners will be furnished by the new building.

Duluth—The northwest enters the coal burning season of 1927-28 with ample fuel reserves at the Lake Superior docks, where stocks aggregate well over 6,000,000 tons of coal, a figure greater by about 200,000 tons than the stock of mid-September, 1926.

St. Paul—Secretary of State and Mrs. Frank B. Kellogg left Washington for their home in St. Paul for a short vacation. Secretary Kellogg's duties have required his presence at his desk in Washington almost continuously during the summer and he expects to rest while at his home.

Montevideo—William Lipp of Waconia, Minn., was elected Minnesota member of the executive committee of the Yellowstone Trail Association when the Minnesota members met for their 16th annual meeting here and decided by vote to continue the work of the organization.

Freeport—Visitors from central Minnesota gathered here to take part in the program which marks the completion of the pavement between Freeport and Albany, and gives this section of the state a hard-surfaced highway from Sauk Center to the Twin cities.

Madison—That dairying is making forward strides in this vicinity is shown by the fact that 14 cars of dairy cattle have been shipped in during the past few weeks. The cattle have been distributed among farmers in the Madison territory. Holsteins and Guernseys have made up the shipments.

Rochester — Governor Theodore Christianson took an escorted stroll in the crisp autumn air. Wearing a light colored suit and a new fall topcoat and carrying a cane, the governor walked along the street at a fairly brisk pace, giving no evidence of the fact that he underwent, only a few weeks ago, a major operation.

Duluth—Establishment of a "tri-state champion dairymen's contest" for leading farm dairymen in the timbered sections of northern Minnesota, upper Michigan and upper Wisconsin, was outlined by M. J. Thompson, vice chairman of the agricultural committee of the Duluth Chamber of Commerce, at a meeting here.

St. Peter—Making his 150 miles a day on a bicycle, Lowell Jepson has come from Detroit, Mich., a distance of approximately 800 miles to resume his work at Gustavus Adolphus College here. Jepson is captain of the tumbling squad at the college and a reserve end in football. He made the bicycle trip to condition himself for the sport season.

St. Paul—Automobile licenses for the year 1927 will exceed $10,000,000, C. M. Babcock, state highway commissioner, said, on the basis of figures compiled by the automobile registration bureau, which showed that up to September 1, license collections were within $1,424 of that amount. A total of 631,561 automobiles were registered during the period, while the total for the whole year was only 3,941 greater.

Minneapolis—On October 4th next the Commonwealth club of Minnesota is sponsoring a dinner meeting at the West hotel, Minneapolis, with a program of prominent speakers who will present the need of care for the aged. Also a plan to care for the aged will be presented and an organization formed to spread information regarding Sunset Homes and to promote legislation for their establishment in Minnesota.

St. Paul—Headed by Dr. H. L. Taylor, St. Paul, president of the National Tuberculosis Association, a delegation of Minnesota sanatorium and Christmas Seal workers will attend the Mississippi Valley Conference on Tuberculosis in St. Louis, Mo., Sept. 26, 27 and 28. Dr. J. A. Myers, Minneapolis, president of the Minnesota Public Health Association, and Dr. E. A. Meyerding, St. Paul, executive secretary of the latter organization, are included in the group. Both Drs. Taylor and Meyerding are scheduled to give addresses during the meeting.

HELP FOR SICK WOMEN

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Has Restored the Health of Thousands

Brooklyn, New York.—Mrs. G. Hegmann of 228 Schaeffer St., was in a run-down condition and could not do her housework. She could not sleep at night. Her story is not an unusual one. Thousands of women find themselves in a similar condition at some time in their lives. "I found your advertisement in my letter box," wrote Mrs. Hegmann, "and took Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and got relief." Mrs. Hegmann also took Lydia E. Pinkham's Herb Medicine and Lydia E. Pinkham's Pills for Constipation, with good results. She says, "I am recommending your medicines to all I know who have symptoms the same as mine, and to others whom I think it will help. You may use my statement as a testimonial, and I will answer any letters sent to me by women who would like information regarding your medicines."

There are women in your state—perhaps in your town—who have written letters similar to this one telling how much Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has helped them.

The Pinkham Medicine Company, Lynn, Mass., will gladly furnish other women with these names upon request.

Settled All Doubts About That Struggle

"Bite off more than you can chew, then chew it."

Mayor Bion Howard, of Brighton, was lecturing on success before the Brighton Y. M. C. A.

"It's a good thing to make ourselves do that, and it's a good thing to make our dependents and connections do it, too," he went on. Listen:

"A young man proposed to a young girl on Brighton's moonlit beach, and then he hastened to suggest a long engagement.

"'Of course, darling, we can't marry for some time,' he said, as he clasped the girl to his heart with all his strength. 'I am too poor to marry now. But, oh, my treasure, if you will only wait! How I'd struggle then to gain a fortune and lay it at your feet! Yes, love, if you'd consent to wait I'd struggle as man never struggled before—struggle as—as—'

"But the girl, withdrawing her lips from his, said firmly:

"'No, George, I'll marry you now, and then you'll have to struggle.'"

Regiments Once Clashed

The "twin" regiments of the Spanish-American war, the First Georgia and the Thirty-first Michigan, were at one time on the verge of a pitched battle, according to W. L. Grayson of Savannah, senior commander-in-chief of the United Spanish War Veterans. The trouble began when the band of the Michigan regiment marched through the camp at Chickamauga park playing "Marching Through Georgia," Grayson related. The Georgia men were restrained by their officers with difficulty and finally decided on an unique retaliation. The next morning, after a hasty night rehearsal of an unfamiliar selection, the Georgia band marched on the parade ground lustily playing the hated "Marching Through Georgia."—Detroit News.

Currency He Understood

When Fred Gun-a-Noot, a northern Indian, was in Stewart, British Columbia, last fall he was deeply impressed with a large auto. On being told the price in dollars, his face fell, but when told that 50 beaver skins would buy the car he grinned and departed. Winter and spring passed and the dealer was surprised to see Fred back with a grin that spread over his countenance. His surprise was greater when the Indian led him to a pile of 50 prime skins averaging $40 each. That closed the deal.

Connecticut Got Bargain

Connecticut takes pride in owning a $100,000 Stuart portrait of George Washington today because it was willing to accept a painting rejected by another state. When the great artist, commissioned by South Carolina to paint the picture, turned it in, it was a portrait of President Washington. South Carolina wanted one of General Washington or none. Connecticut bought the picture for $1,000.

"How was your voyage?"

"Fine. I danced all the way across."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

EASY LESSONS IN AUCTION BRIDGE

By PAUL H. SEYMOUR
Author of "Highlights on Auction Bridge"

(Copyright, by Hoyle, Jr.)

Article Three.

How to Score

IF THE declarer has won the number of tricks which the final bid guaranteed he scores the proper amount for each odd trick according to what was trump. Thus if he had bid four diamonds and takes 10 or more tricks he scores 7 for each trick won above 6. This score is placed below the line on the score pad and counts toward game. Game is 30 trick points, but although all excess points are scored, only one game may be won in one hand.

The honor score is kept separate and is placed above the line on the score pad. In a suit declaration the honors are the Ace, King, Queen, Jack, and 10 of the trump suit. The honors are scored for the side to which they were dealt, although they are not scored until after the hand is played. They count as follows:

Three honors in the two hands of partners count 30.

Four honors in the two hands of partners count 40.

Four honors in one hand count 80.

Four honors in one hand and fifth in partner's, count 90.

Five honors in one hand count 100.

In no trump the aces are the honors and count as follows

Three in the two hands of partners count 30.

Four in the two hands of partners count 40.

Four in one hand count 100.

If the declarer takes 12 tricks it is called a small slam and he scores 50 points bonus above the line. If he takes 13 tricks it is a grand slam and counts 100. These counts are in addition to the trick score.

If the declarer fails to take as many tricks as his bid calls for—that is, if he fails to make his contract—there is no score towards game and the opponents score 50 points above the line for every trick which the declarer should have taken, called undertricks. In either case each side scores the honors held by them. Honor count cannot be lost. Honors always are scored as held.

After one side has made a game, 30 points or more, a line is drawn under the score and any portion of a game previously scored by the other side does not count towards a new game. When one side wins two games in succession, or two out of three, it is called a rubber and 250 points are scored for it above the line.

The Double and the Redouble

If during the auction any player thinks that he can defeat the last bid of his opponent, he may double by saying "I double," and if three passes follow the double, the hand is played by the last bidder with double values for the tricks if he fulfills his contract and double penalties for undertricks if he fails. If a declarer wins after being doubled he also scores, above the line, 50 points for fulfilling his contract and 50 points for each trick won in excess of his contract. If he is defeated the opponents score 100 points above the line for each undertrick.

However, if the bidder who is doubled is confident he can make his contract, he may redouble by saying, "I redouble." Then if three passes follow his redouble, he plays the hand with each trick counting four times its normal value if he fulfills his contract, and a penalty of 200 for each undertrick if he fails. If declarer makes a redoubled contract he also scores, above the line, 100 points for fulfilling his contract, and 100 points for each trick won above his contract.

Honors are not affected by doubling or redoubling. They always are scored the same.

California Had Own Banner as Republic

Mountains, deserts and poor communications in the early days isolated California from the other Spanish possessions in America, and after Mexico won independence, the California region became even less answerable to central authority. It enjoyed practical autonomy while the rest of Mexico was engaged in internal strife.

Americans and other non-Mexicans filtered into California and assumed importance in its affairs. After 1840 it became apparent that California would not remain long under even the nominal authority of Mexico, but the landholders were divided as to what the future status of the country should be. Some favored annexation to the United States and others advocated a British protectorate. In this period, the United States and Mexico engaged in war over Texas, the former Mexican state that had become a republic and then annexed itself to the United States.

Col. John C. Fremont took advantage of the situation, seized Sonoma and on July 4, 1846, proclaimed California a republic. The banner of the new republic bore a bear, and this was the flag that Fremont hoisted. The conquest of the region was speedily effected by Fremont, Stockton, Kearny and others, and on August 15, 1846, the republic of California was annexed to the United States.—Kansas City Times.

Baby Boy Drowns in Shallow Soup Bowl

Lodi, N. J.—Roger Ollivier, fourteen months, son of Mr. and Mrs. Louis Ollivier of No. 31 Mercer street, drowned in a large bowl of soup.

The soup was in a crockery bowl about one foot in diameter and six inches deep. The mother had placed it on the floor to cool while she went to a near-by grocery store.

The infant had been left on the kitchen floor and evidently crawled over to look at the steaming liquid. He fell in and was drowned before his mother returned.

Police Capt. Steven Nebensi heard the mother's screams as he was passing and ran inside. Efforts to revive the child were unsuccessful.

END REVEALS FALL FROM HIGH ESTATE

Son of E. P. Roe, Popular Novelist, Dies in Park.

New York.—The life history of a man who inherited fame and fortune, lost both and for more than a decade held an obscure position as usher in a Broadway theater, stood revealed as the body of Murray Roe, fifty-three, lay in the morgue awaiting an autopsy.

Roe, designer of the Riverside drive viaduct above Grant's tomb and son of Rev. E. P. Roe, novelist, was found dead in a lonely section of Central park, the body propped between two rocks. A few dollars, a watch and some letters were all that the pockets of the cheap clothing contained.

After inheriting a considerable fortune from his father, Roe gained laurels of his own when, at the age of twenty-seven, he was appointed consulting engineer of the Riverside drive project. For his services, it was said, he received $75,000, an amount then considered quite large.

At the height of his success he married Miss Frances Doniphan Thornton in 1905 and the guests at the wedding included many persons of prominence. He was a prominent figure in New York social life until a year later. Word then came from California that his wife had obtained a divorce, and for several years his friends did not hear from him. It was said that he went to South America, where he lost both health and fortune.

In 1913 he returned, seeking employment. A job as porter of the Palace theater was offered and he quickly accepted. His diligence soon won him a place as usher and then the post of head usher.

Physicians established that his death apparently was due to asthma. Friends advanced the theory that he had gone to the park and propped himself up in the secluded spot because his condition made it impossible for him to sleep while lying down.

Seven-Year Hunt for Lost Wife and Child

Los Angeles, Calif.—George Westbrook, United States marine, is the tragic hero of a seven-year Oriental Odyssey.

Through three lands of the Orient Westbrook wandered looking for his Spanish wife and six-year-old daughter, he explained in seeking letters of administration to their estate.

One evening, seven years ago, he came home to his bungalow at a lonely Philippine outpost to find supper on the table and his wife and daughter missing.

For a year he searched the Philippines. Then faint clues took him to China and India.

"I have searched the world over," he said when the court declared his family legally dead. "I do not believe my wife deserted me. I think the natives took her and she is dead."

Tossed by Mad Bull, Victim Has Revenge

Marshfield, Ore.—Price Robinson, a Norway farmer, broke the neck of his prize bull when he fell across the animal's back after being tossed into the air. The bull, being led through a pasture, charged Mr. Robinson and tossed him high in the air.

Coming down upon the bull's back, Mr. Robinson was badly hurt, but the bull's neck was broken. Mr. Robinson is yet confined to his home.

Mountain Is Crumbling

Rock Spring, Wyo.—Slowly crumpling and losing its tremendous rock slides, a large mountain, 110 miles north of here, has stirred tourists with its phenomenal movements. Millions of tons of earth and boulders have tumbled into a canyon below the rocky giant. Nearby, Freemont Lake, with huge deposits of rocks in its bed from the slides, has overflowed and another lake is being formed. The mountain is approximately 10,000 feet above sea level.

Lacey Refused to Mix

Stroudsburg, Pa.—The champion non-mixer is William Lacey. Caught in a big concrete mixer, into which he had crawled to make repairs, Lacey was whirled for three minutes in the contents of sand, water and cement but escaped with cuts and bruises.

Made Business Good at the Drug Counter

Anyone passing a Chestnut street drug store the other evening would have been impressed that a group of "sneezers" were convening, or possibly an early gathering of the "Hay Fever society," from countless "achoos" bursting forth, but these spasmodic sounds were carelessly caused by a waitress in charge of the sandwich counter reserved for hungry patrons.

She was in the act of filling a few containers for salt and pepper, and as she thoughtlessly placed the tray which held the seasoning before an electric fan, the customers in line of the breeze received the pungent aromatic condiment with full force, thus causing the air to be spasmodically forced through their noses.

One timid old gentleman, realizing he was developing a cold, walked to the other side of the store and had the clerk wrap up a goodly quantity of aspirin, quinine, nasal salve and cold-in-the-head tablets.—Philadelphia Record.

Wealthy Canadians

Canada's national wealth is officially estimated at $22,000,000,000, which works out on the average at $5,525 per person. This is apart from undeveloped natural resources.

It is estimated that national wealth at the time of confederation was less than $1,500,000,000, so that it has multiplied about 14 times since Canada became a dominion. Agricultural values make up about $8,000,000,000 of the present total, urban real estate nearly $6,000,000,000 and the railways considerably more than $2,000,000,000. Ontario owns about one-third, Quebec one-quarter, and Saskatchewan, one-eighth.

Sister Strangely Found

Issack Baskowitz's eyes were attracted to the likeness of a pretty girl on a calendar in a Dallas (Texas) office. He was amazed at the resemblance to a younger sister from whom he was separated in Russia ten years ago. Baskowitz communicated with the lithographer of the calendar and learned that the subject was none other than his sister Gertrude, who is now eighteen years old. He left for New York for a reunion with the girl.

Commercial Club Holds a Meeting

The Holt Commercial Club held its annual meeting Tuesday evening to elect new officers and to transact other business. About the usual number were present. The first matter taken up at the meeting was whether Holt shoud have a Community Day. This matter was discussed for a while and finally it was decided to let this part of the fall entertainments of the Commercial Club be left out and something else take its place.

Everyone who was there was in favor of rebuilding the skating rink here for winter entertainment, and a committee was appointed to look into the matter.

H. O. Hanson, local editor, was re-elected president, and Paul R. Palmer, local school teacher, was re-elected secretary.

Several committees were appointed at this meeting to look after different arrangements which are expected to be worked out in the near future.

Another meeting will be held at the O. E. Sovde barber shop next Tuesday evening, October 18th, at 8 p. m., when the committees will make their reports on what course the Club is to take in putting on some new entertainment.

All members who have not paid their dues for the past year are requested to please leave them at the Bank or pay them to Mr. Palmer.

Yankees Won

The New York Yankees defeated the Pittsburgh Pirates in the World Series last week by winning four games straight. Babe Ruth was the outstanding card on the Yanks' side of the series.

Wolves Are Numerous

Farmers from the territory to the east of Holt are complaining about the wolves killing their sheep, chickens, and turkeys lately. Gunder Tveit of Golden Valley has lost a number of turkeys, and a flock of about twenty birds has been killed off for Ole Maakstad. Isaac Ostlund reports that he has lost some sheep, which were killed close to the building on their farm in the day-time by the wolves. At the rate of bounty which the county is paying for the killing of these animals, some one who is quick on the draw should be able to go out and make good wages killing these bold marauders.

Eat Less and Live Longer, Says Lawyer

By W. W. O'BRIEN

(Noted Criminal Lawyer of Chicago.)

W. W. O'Brien.

Business and professional men working under high nervous pressure do not live as long as men whose pursuits keep them out of doors and active. Examine the records of longevity and you will find that on the average the longest-lived men are soldiers, sailors and farmers, all avocations which tend to keep a man at his physical best.

Man, in general, rolls down the hill of life fastest when his figure is rotund. "Leanness and longevity" is a good axiom for business men to remember. If office workers would eat a little less, they would add years to their lives.

Overfeeding is as dangerous to adults as underfeeding is to children. Foods difficult to digest, or which overstimulate, should be avoided by persons whose work does not require any particular amount of physical exercise. Yet thousands of business men eat as much as or more than men who do manual labor. And, inevitably, nature rebels and sickness results.

Many of the country's foremost executives eat but two meals a day, breakfast and dinner in the evening. They seek to keep the organs of the body from becoming clogged. Thousands of other business men confine themselves at noontime to custards, puddings, soups and other sustaining dishes made with milk, or evaporated milk, which is milk in its most sterile form, from which 60 per cent of the water has been removed by evaporation. Such a diet is light and readily assimilated.

There is no more necessary lesson to be learned by the brain worker than how to keep well and healthy by proper attention to food habits.

Let's Have A Skating Rink This Winter

All those who are interested in having a good skating rink here for the winter should come to the front now and assist in getting things lined up for a general good time. Some money is needed for repairing the old rink and it is hoped that this money can be raised someway without much trouble. A good skating rink is a place where you can all have a lot of fun cheap, and it will also help to dress up the town.

Mrs. Risberg In Hospital

Mrs. Walmer Risberg was taken suddenly ill early Monday morning and had to call a doctor to attend to her case. She was taken to Thief River Falls in the afternoon of the same day to remain there for medical treatment.

In Collision

The balls which the Pittsburg Pirates hurled at the Yanks in the Worlds Series were badly damaged when they collided with the bats of the Yankee sluggers.

Pontiac Sedan Ditched

While enroute to Thief River Falls on Tuesday, Mr. and Mrs. Oscar Sorenson of Newfolden had the hard luck of having their new Pontiac sedan, in which they were riding, turn upside down in the road ditch near the Herman Heinze farm a mile north of this village. Mr. Sorenson told a News reporter that he was driving very slowly and that he felt the car skid on the slippery road and at once applied the brakes, which turned the car around, bringing it to a stop, when it toppled over into the ditch. Very little damage was done to the car, as a bent fender and a small brace on the top was all that was broke.

Mrs. John Hagberg entertained a number of ladies to a quilting party at her home on Saturday afternoon. Those invited were: Mrs. W. S. Risberg, Mrs. A. T. Hagen, Mrs. H. O. Hanson, Mrs. P. A. Risberg and Mrs. O. E. Hagglund.

Mr. and Mrs. Per Reierson are this week making preparation for moving to Thief River Falls.

Auto Registration Passed 1926 Mark

Mike Holm, secretay of state, reports that at the close of business on September 30 the registrations for 1927 to date were 638,028 motor vehicles, with a total revenue collected of $10,075,465.97.

"This means that we have already passed the total of registrations for the whole year of 1926," said Holm. "We have already registered more motor vehicles for 1927 than were registed for 1926 at the end of the year, and have collected $94,667.33 more in revenue."

It is interesting to note that there not only is an increase in revenue, but the average tax per car is also somewhat higher, being $15.73 in 1927 as compared with $15.71 in 1926. With three months left to go, the prospects are that by the end of the year Minnesota will be well on toward the total of 700,000 motor vehicles.

THIS WOMAN FOUND RELIEF

After Long Suffering by Taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

In a little town of the middle West, was a discouraged woman. For four months she had been in such poor health that she could not stoop to put on her own shoes. Unable to do her work, unable to go out of doors or enjoy a friendly chat with her neighbors, life seemed dark indeed to Mrs. Daugherty.

Then one day, a booklet was left at her front door. Idly she turned the pages. Soon she was reading with quickened interest. The little booklet was filled with letters from women in conditions similar to hers who had found better health by taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

"I began taking the Vegetable Compound," Mrs. Daugherty writes, "and after I took the third bottle, I found relief. I am on my eleventh bottle and I don't have that trouble any more, and feel like a different woman. I recommend the Vegetable Compound to everyone I see who has trouble like mine, and you can use these facts as a testimonial. I am willing to answer any letters from women asking about the Vegetable Compound."—MRS. ED. DAUGHERTY, 1308 Orchard Ave., Muscatine, Iowa.

The GREEN CLOAK

By YORKE DAVIS

WNU Service.
Copyright, 1926

STORY FROM THE START

Dr. Ronald McAllister, psychologist, undertakes to solve the mystery of the murder of a recluse, Henry Morgan. The dead man's papers reveal that he had been in New Zealand, where McAllister had lived in his youth. Will Harvey testifies to seeing a woman in a green cloak at the Morgan home the night of the murder. Doctor McAllister is asked to see a young woman patient in a hospital. In her delirium she mutters in a strange language which only McAllister understands. He suspects she may know something of the murder. A carefully hidden map is discovered by McAllister and Assistant District Attorney Ashton in Morgan's home. While they are searching a young woman enters the house in the darkness and escapes, leaving behind a green cloak. In response to an advertisement of the finding of a green cloak, a young woman, giving her name as Jane Perkins, housemaid at The Meredith, claims it. McAllister takes two laboratory instruments to The Meredith for an undisclosed purpose. The head waiter, Wilkins, admits Jane Perkins is employed at the hotel. By a tatoo mark on the arm she is advertised as the hospital patient. McAllister hypnotizes the girl.

He stood perfectly still before her, except that the hand which held the mirror permitted it to swing very slowly, pendulum-wise, before her, though always at an angle that sent the beam straight into her eyes.

From my corner of the room I watched him breathlessly. Of course it was perfectly obvious to see what he was doing. The examination of her eyes had been a mere pretext. His real object in inducing the girl to strain her eyes upward was to throw her into a hypnotic sleep. The method he had taken was an old-fashioned one, and one he rarely used. At the laboratory he hypnotized people almost daily by the simple and almost instantaneous process of having them lie down and telling them that they were going to sleep. But that method was absolutely dependent upon a condition which could not exist here. The patient must expect to be hypnotized and be in a state of willing submission. We had no reason to suppose that Jane Perkins would submit herself to any such test as that in the hands of strangers. And even with his mirror he would not be able to hypnotize her if she should suspect that this was what he was trying to do, and should resist. But his confident, friendly manner, his easy assumption of authority, the fact that he came from the same part of the world as herself—all this speedily disarmed suspicion.

At the end of three or four minutes of silence the doctor turned away and laid his little mirror upon the table.

"It's five minutes past eight," he said, with a second glance at his watch. "We haven't any time to lose. Close all the windows; that's the first thing to do—and lock them. And then we'll bolt both doors—it won't do to take any chances—and, in general, try to be ready for anything she may do. I think you'd better stand behind her chair, over yonder, where she won't see you at first. Now—are you ready?"

He stationed himself where he had stood before, just a pace or two away from the chair where the girl lay asleep. His eyes were shining, and every line of the attitude of his big sinewy body bespoke the relaxation possible only to nervous systems of very high order, the relaxation that is ready to exert its utmost effort in any direction; that is braced against nothing because it is expecting anything.

And then, softly at first but growing louder, he began to hum once more that old Maori death chant.

From my station behind the chair I could see nothing of the girl, except one hand, which hung out over the arm of it. I fixed my eyes on that, and as I stood there saw it change, saw in it the index of some mysterious incredible transformation that must be permeating every fiber of her body. It had been Jane Perkins' hand a moment ago—a chambermaid's hand, pudgy, lifeless, inexpressive. Now, indefinably, it was different, altogether different. The fingers stretched apart a little as if they tingled with the warmth and life of a new current, intenser, more electrical. The hand opened wide, then slowly clenched itself into a fist; and last of all it sprang open again, distended to its widest reach, with galvanic quickness which Jane Perkins' nerves would never have been capable of commanding.

The doctor broke off his song, and there followed, for one dead moment, a silence, which was shattered at the end of it by a strange, weird, half-suppressed outcry. The next instant the girl had flashed out of her chair, and stood confronting me. The quickness of her motion was absolutely indescribable. Her face was now the one we had seen in the hospital and had glimpsed dimly in the dark in Henry Morgan's study.

At the sight of me she shrank, crouched, rather, for something about the action suggested that it might be followed by a spring. Her hand flashed to her bosom and explored there for something—a knife probably—that it did not find. What she would have done then, whether she would have flung herself upon me unarmed, I do not know, but the doctor began speaking to her just then, quietly, authoritatively, and in the Maori tongue. He was not trying to soothe her fears, or at least not doing it in any way that is commonly practiced by us modern people. He was giving her orders, orders which he was prepared to enforce by brute strength if she should make it necessary. So much was plain from his manner.

Of course I could not understand a word he said. The girl cowered at the voice, but it seemed to reassure her, for all of that. The wild light in her eyes died. They became sullen. She squatted on the floor in a corner of the room. Evidently chairs and their uses were as strange to her as her present attitude would have been to Jane Perkins.

Then began one of the strangest scenes I ever witnessed. Except for what I could gather from their faces, and from the inflection of his questions and her sullen, half-defiant answers, it was totally unintelligible to me. Even the inflections told me little, for the language itself is spoken in a queer sort of sing-song, which betrayed no family relationship with any other language I ever heard. But in the doctor's face I could read strange matters—excitement, dawning comprehension and dawning horror, too. It was strangely tantalizing to know that this mystery, the clue to which I had vainly sought, was in process of being unraveled right before my eyes and I was as much in the dark as ever.

Then, as if the doctor had read my thoughts, he spoke to the girl in English:

"Fanenna," he said, "I am talking English. I am going to ask you questions in English, and you will understand me. Did you understand what I said then?"

The girl nodded. And yet I was sure that if I had spoken to her she would not have comprehended a word. It was in its way as strange and perfect a demonstration of the possibilities of hypnotism as I had ever seen. The doctor called in Jane Perkins' memory to act as the girl's interpreter.

"What is the man's name," the doctor asked, "the man who sent you?"

Her answer was two words that sounded like "Osa Enns." I saw that for a moment it puzzled the doctor as much as it did me. But, the next moment, evidently, he understood, for his face lighted rather grimly.

"You came away, did you, without the thing he sent you to get?"

She nodded.

"And you hadn't been told to kill the old man? You didn't mean to kill him when you stole into the house?"

She answered with a deep-throated guttural, even to my ears, unmistakably in the negative.

"Then why did you kill him?"

She flung her head back, her eyes blazed defiance and from her lips poured forth a torrent of speech.

"Stop!" said the doctor. "If you can understand English, you can talk it, too. Speak in the same language I am speaking in, and tell why you killed him."

"I was sworn to kill him."

The words came thickly, slowly clumsily, for tongue and lips were finding difficulty with them, but they were clearly and quite intelligibly English.

I saw the doctor's face light up at the sound of them, for it was the completion of the most interesting experiment he had ever tried. The girl was still submerged, completely, in her wild, primitive, under-self. She was no more Jane Perkins than as if she had occupied another body altogether, and yet, by the strange hypnotic power of suggestion, the doctor was compelling her to use Jane Perkins' knowledge of English to talk with.

"Who swore you to such an oath?" he asked.

"My mother, when she was dying. It was a vengeance. He had murdered my father. He murdered him before I was born."

"If it happened before you were born," said the doctor quickly, "then, unless you knew beforehand that Henry Morgan was the man you were sworn to murder, how did you know it when you found him in that house?"

Out of the front of her blouse she pulled a little chamois-skin bag which hung about her neck by a fine gold chain.

"By this," she said. "It had belonged to him, the murderer. My mother kept it and gave it to me so that I should know him."

For an instant I did not understand but immediately after, the way she had detected our presence in that room, by the smell, gave me an inkling.

"Then you can tell people by their odor?" the doctor asked.

"As a dog does," she answered simply.

"He murdered your father, you say, before you were born? Do you know who your father was? What was his name?"

"Flanka," she answered.

For an instant the doctor gazed at her wide-eyed; then, turning away to conceal his excitement, he struck one palm, softly, three or four times with the other fist.

Presently he turned back to the girl.

"Did your mother swear you to anything else?"

"No."

"Did she give you anything when she died?"

"No."

"Not even a message? I mean did she tell you anything, anything about Flanka?"

"She told me these words," said the girl, "she said them a great many times, 'Ouan feef, ti oues. Ten sout.'"

That is the best reproduction I can make of the sound of them. I supposed she was speaking in Maori, until, glancing up at the doctor, I saw that he was as much puzzled as I was.

"What's that?" he asked. "Say it again."

She repeated the syllables glibly and without the slightest variation in her inflection of them.

"What does that mean?" he questioned. "That's not your language nor mine."

She shook her head.

"You don't understand it yourself?"

Again she shook her head, and repeated once more the queer, meaningless syllables.

There was a moment of silence, the doctor gazing at her in a puzzled way, all his faculties concentrated upon this fresh mystery.

In the midst of that silence the girl sprang suddenly erect, and from her tense attitude it was evident that she was listening; that she had heard something. To our ears all was still.

"Hearing abnormal, too," murmured the doctor in a swift aside to me.

Then he spoke to the girl. "Fanenna," he said, "you are to go into that other room and wait until I call for you. When I want you, I will call, 'Perkins,' and you will come out, believing that it is the first time I have called you from the bedroom. You will remember the knife and vase of water, but you will believe that you have dreamed it. And when I call the word 'Perkins,' you will wake up and come in. Go now." He unlocked the door as he spoke.

She obeyed without hesitation. By that time I myself heard footsteps approaching down the corridor.

"Go in there after her, Phelps," said the doctor, "and see that the windows and doors in all the other rooms of the apartment are locked and bolted. Then come back here as quickly as you can."

I heard a tap at the door just as I was finishing the task, and immediately afterward heard the doctor open it. When I returned to the sitting room, he turned toward me and spoke rather quickly. There was a note of suppressed excitement in his voice.

"Phelps, here's Ashton come to pay us a call."

Without waiting for me to comment on the situation, he turned back to the district attorney.

"I thought it not unlikely," he said, "that, with one intention or another, you would make us a visit this evening."

His manner was perfectly neutral, neither friendly in the old way, nor hostile as it might have been expected to be after the scene in the laboratory.

Ashton flushed a little. "Oh, I've come to apologize," he said. "My accusation against you and Mr. Phelps this afternoon was quite unwarranted."

"Antipodes" Too Often Term Wrongly Used

The term "antipodes" is strictly applied to any two peoples or places on opposite sides of the earth and so situated that a straight line drawn from one to another passes through the center of the earth. Loosely, however, the term is applied to any place on the opposite side of the earth from us. China is popularly supposed to be the antipodes of the United States and there is an old saying that if one were to dig a hole deep enough he would fall into China. But this is a misconception, for China and the United States are both in the northern hemisphere. The true antipodes of the United States is a region in the Indian ocean west of Australia. No part of the North American continent has its antipodes in any land surface. The antipodes of South America fall in the region of China, the Philippines and Borneo, while the antipodes of Europe and Asia are in the South Pacific. The approximate antipodes of London is Antipodes island, near New Zealand.—Pathfinder Magazine.

So Joe had died, a body clad in gala dress swirling out on currents that would never bring him back. Anne said nothing. She did not feel any special grief, or feeling of any kind. Too much had happened, she was benumbed. She had a vague sense that in some future time, when she had recovered from her dulled and battered state, she might be sorry, cry perhaps. Her eyes fell on her hand with Sybil's clasped around it and the sight of the linked fingers roused her. She lifted her head and looked at the face beside her:

"But—but—why did you do all this? Hide, not say anything, let them think you were dead?"

"I wanted to get away."

"Get away! What for—where?"

"To Jim Dallas. I know where he is."

"You've known?"

"For a month. I've written him telling him I'd come if I could, if I ever could. Oh, but it's been hopeless. I was spied on, dogged, followed—" Her voice rose on a hoarse note, stopped, and after a scared listening hush, went on whispering: "I want to stay dead, never come to life here again. It's my chance—the only chance I'll ever have. You've found me now and I'll tell you everything." And she told Anne the story—the story that no one else has ever heard.

Since she had received his address the longing to join her lover had possessed her. She had written she would come, she knew he was waiting for her, but the watch kept upon her made any move impossible. Whatever her anguish, she could not risk betraying his whereabouts; if it had been only herself she would have dared anything. In this position, growing daily more unbearable, had suddenly come the means of escape. Tragedy, swift and terrible as a bolt from the blue, had been her opportunity, and she had desperately seized it.

From her window, after the interview with Stokes, she had seen Joe, in his Sebastian dress, pass below. She had known it was he because of the costume and was astonished, supposing him already gone. Stokes came into view following him and the disturbing idea seized her that he had mistaken the boy for herself. She had run to the door to go down and end the misapprehension, and then stopped—at close quarters Stokes would see who it was, and to let Joe—evil-tongued and hostile—discover their rendezvous, was the last thing she wanted. She went back to the window to watch the outcome and saw neither of them. This frightened her—the only place they could have disappeared to was the summer house. Stokes might say too much before he discovered his mistake, and panic-stricken, she was about to rush out, when Joe ran from the doorway and the shot followed.

For a space—she had no idea how long—she was paralyzed, not believing her senses. She remembered moving back into the room and from there she saw Stokes issue from the summer house and flee to the shelter of the pine wood that told her what she had seen was real, a murder had been committed under her eyes, and she went to the door to go down. Holding it open she paused on the threshold, heard the voices below, heard Stokes' entering words and had made a forward step to run down and denounce him, when a sound from outside stopped her, Flora's cry that Sybil was killed.

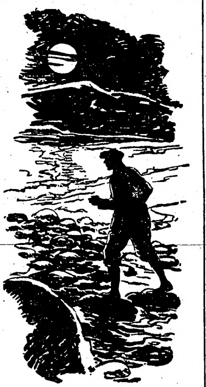
It was that wild screaming voice that gave her the idea, sent it through her brain like a zigzag of lightning. While the people below made their clamorous rush from the house, she stood in the doorway, motionless in contemplation of the possibilities that opened before her. The excitement that had shaken her a few minutes earlier died, her mind steadied and cleared, she felt herself uplifted by an invincible daring and courage. There was no danger of a recovery of the body for she had heard from Gabriel and Miss Pinkney that bodies carried out on the tide were never found.

Alone on the second floor with little fear of interruption she had gone about her preparations at once. She had taken nothing from her own room but money from her purse (leaving a small amount to avert suspicion) the candles from the box on the table, a few crackers she had brought up the night before from supper, and a pair of scissors. Then going to Joe's room she had gathered the clothes he had discarded, lying ready to her hand on the bed—everything from the shoes to the cap—and stolen out and upward to the top floor. Here she had put on the clothes and cut off her hair—she showed Anne the ends of the yellow curls in her jacket pocket—hiding her own clothes in a box in the storeroom.

The next day she had been a prey to a rising tide of alarm. From behind a curtain she had watched the search of the island and realized a hunt through the top floor must follow. Every sign of her presence was obliterated and she studied her surroundings for a hiding place. The windows, opened half way to air the rooms, suggested the possibility of a cache outside. Climbing up the wall and extending to the roof was the great wisteria vine, its outspread branches twisted into ropes and covered with a mantle of dense foliage. The main trunk passed close to the window of the room that faced the stair-head, the place where she sat waiting for ascending footsteps. When Anne had made her visit, she had heard the first creak of the stairs and crawled out under the raised window. With a foothold on the gutter she had slipped behind the curtain of the vine, her hands gripped round its limbs. Even from the garden below she thought it would have been impossible to detect her. Of Anne's whispered pleadings she had heard nothing; she had supposed the intruder one of the men. When they came up she had had plenty of time to hide for she had heard their footsteps when they came along the hall.

After the visit of Rawson and Williams she knew the danger of detection increased with every hour. Also the necessity for food could not be denied much longer. The one chance left her was to get away that night, make what she felt would be a last attempt to gain the freedom that meant life to her. The darkness was in her favor and she resolved to slip from the house and cross the bed of the channel below the causeway.

At the foot of the stairs she had hesitated, undecided whether to go by the living room or the kitchen. Finally she chose the way she knew best, where she was familiar with the disposition of the furniture. As the flashlight burst she had made a noiseless rush for the stairs, was in the upper passage when the women's doors flew open and Rawson came running along the hall below. The darkness and noise had covered her flight, but in her eyrie on the top floor she had crouched at the head of the stairs sick with uncertainty and dread. The concerted shrieks of the women had come eerily to her—cries of her own name. She guessed then a picture had been taken, they had seen it, and she waited, not knowing what was coming. She had stayed there a long time, listening with every sense alert, heard silence gathering over the house and then gone back to her place by the window:



It Stood Out in Sharp Silhouette.

"I hadn't given up, I had the spirit to fight still. But it was so awful not knowing anything, what they were doing, if they'd found out I was alive. And what was I to do—stay here, get out on the island? I couldn't tell, I was all in the dark, and I felt my nerve weaken for the first time. And then I heard your voice, Anne, 'I'm coming to help you,' it said." She drew back and looked with solemn meaning into the other's face. "You meant it? You will help me?"

"Sybil, you know it."

"There's only one way you can."

"Any way."

"Let me go."

"Never tell—that you were here—that it wasn't you?"

"Yes, let me stay dead. Everybody believes it, let them go on believing. It was death, my life since that night when Jim disappeared. It wasn't worth going on with. Now I can go to him, be with him, there'll be no one watching Sybil Saunders any more. Even if I looked like myself it would be only the chance resemblance to a murdered woman. And do I look like myself?"

She turned her face to the light, bright now with the coming of the sun. Below the smooth sweep of hair across her forehead it was so changed in its pallor and thinness, so bereft of its rounded curves and delicate freshness that it was only a dim reflection of Sybil's—the face of a wayworn lad in whom the same blood ran.

The havoc worked by the suffering that had so transfigured it drove like a knife to Anne's heart. She felt the prick of tears under her eyelids and lowered her head—Sybil gripping at her happiness with the fierce courage of despair, and now Sybil going, breaking all ties, going forever. For a moment she could not speak and the other, thinking her silence meant reluctance to agree, caught at her hands, pleading, with breathless urgence:

"They've accepted everything—it's all explained and ended. Joe has gone, dropped out of sight. Boys of his kind do that, do something they're ashamed of and disappear. What good would it do Stokes or Bassett or the police to know it was Joe who was killed? It's not lies, it's not being false to anyone, it's only to keep silent and let me go. Oh, Anne, we've been real friends, we've loved each other—Love me enough to let me be happy."

The rim of the sun slipped above the distant sea line and sent a ray of brilliant light through the window. It touched their seated figures and lay rosy on Anne's face as she raised it.

"Go," she said softly. "Go. I'll never tell—I'll keep that promise as long as I live."

She could stay no longer, the house would be waking soon. There was a rapid interchange of last injunctions, information for Sybil's safety. Tonight at low tide she would cross on the causeway. Every evidence of her occupation would be removed and with this in mind she took her Viola dress from its hiding place and gave it to Anne. No one, ransacking the top floor at Gull Island would ever find a trace of her.

That night was cloudy—great black banks passing across the heavens. At times they broke and through serene open spaces the moon rode, silvering the sea, turning the pools and streamlets of the channel bed to a shining tracery. A boy's figure that had started across the causeway in the dark, was caught in one of these transitory gleams, a flitting shadow on the straight bright path. It stood out in sharp silhouette, running on the slippery stones, then clouds swept across the moon and in the darkness it gained the shore and the sheltering trees.

Dogs scented its passage and broke out barking; the sound following its progress till the houses were passed and the road stretched on between quiet fields to the railway.

Some people heard the dogs—light-sleeping villagers who turned and wondered if a tramp was about and lapsed into comfortable slumber. In the stillness of the room where Stokes lay unconscious, drawing toward the hour of deliverance, the barking sounded loud and insistent. The nurse was disturbed by it and went to the window and looked out, but Flora never heard it. Anne did and sat up in bed following it along the edge of the village till it died on the outskirts.

EPILOGUE

Three years later Bassett and Anne had a friend at dinner. He was a writer who had just returned from a successful lecture tour in Australia. On his way back he had ranged through the pleasant reaches of the South seas and had fallen under their spell—a little more money in his pocket and for him it would be a plantation on some isle of enchantment. Not the accessible places, they were already spoiled, steamers had come, jazz music, and tourists in pith helmets with red guidebooks were under your feet. It was the remoter islands, still out of the line of travel, where a trading schooner was the sole link with the world.

He had made a point of visiting some of these—hired an old tub with a native crew and gone batting about and had a glimpse of the real thing that Stevenson saw. And he enlarged on a particular island, the endmost of a scattered group, where he had found an American and his wife running a copra plantation. Delightful people called Whittier, he'd stayed several days with them in a long bamboo house on the edge of a lagoon—you couldn't imagine anything more beautiful.

After dinner, moving about in the sitting room, the guest had stopped before a photograph standing on a side table, picked it up and asked whose it was. Bassett had answered—a friend of his wife, now dead. But he would remember—it was Sybil Saunders who had met with such a tragic death some years ago. The guest nodded; of course he remembered, a horrible affair. Then after a last look at the photograph he turned to Anne:

"It's like that Mrs. Whittier I was telling you about. Just the same eyes—quite remarkably like, only she's a bit stouter and more mature. It might have been her picture when she was a girl."

When the evening was over Bassett escorted the guest to the door. On his way back to the sitting room he thought he would suggest to Anne that she put away the photograph—people noticed it and the subject kept coming up. It was evidently unbearably painful to her for she rarely spoke of it; that dark chapter in her life was a thing closed and sealed. He had the words on his lips as he entered the room and then saw that she held the picture in her hands and was looking intently at it, softly smiling, her expression tranquil even happy. That was good—the wound had healed—so he said nothing.

[THE END.]

Etiquette Constant Problem

Proper manners are set by the leaders of every age in history, and yet "high society" is hardly less guilty than the lower social orders at times. The situation became so bad during the reign of Louis XIV in France, who had poor eating manners, that books of instruction were issued then as now. At one time the fork was held "indecent."

MINNESOTA BRIEFS

St. Paul—Oscar Smith, former state immigration commissioner, was appointed as superintendent of scales by the Minnesota railroad and warehouse commission.

Minneapolis — Minnesota farmers planted 442,000 fewer acres to small grains this year than in 1926, but on the basis of present estimates will get 38,800,000 more bushels of grain from their fields, the July crop report indicated. The report is by Paul H. Kirk, agricultural statistician, Minnesota University.

St. Paul—Vernon Ewing, of Tamarack, whose efforts to obtain divine manifestations brought him considerable attention last year, plans on bringing his evangelical work into the state capitol. He announced at Tamarack that he will conduct a "silent prayer" in St. Paul on August 1, beginning at 11 a. m.

Minneapolis—Barge freight rates 60 per cent under existing rail rates on grain shipped from Minneapolis to New Orleans for export were published here by W. W. Morse, operating manager of the Upper Mississippi Barge Line Company. The new tariffs will become effective August 15, coincident with the actual establishment of a regular freight service by the barge line company.

St. Peter—On the musty testimony of an old letter found a year ago in the trunk of a man who had been his guardian, William A. Judge Carol A. Nye of Moorhead was elected president with Judge Grier M. Orr of St. Paul vicepresident and Judge W. W. Bardwell of Minneapolis secretary-treasurer.

St. Paul—An appeal to local officers for stringent enforcement of the motor vehicle license law was issued by Charles M. Babcock, state highway commissioner, as one of the important details in the furtherance of highway construction. Mr. Babcock pointed out that only three highway employes are available to check violations of the license law and that with more than 600,000 motor vehicles being operated in the state.

St. Paul—Crown Prince Gustav Adolf of Sweden conferred a further honor on a Twin City woman, Lydia Caroline Bungener, head cook in the St. Paul home of Secretary of State Frank B. Kellogg, received a diploma of a court medal which the Swedish heir awarded her on his visit here a year ago. Nils Leon Jaenson, Swedish viceconsul in Minneapolis, gave the diploma to Governor Theodore Christianson for transmission to Miss Bungener.

St. Paul—Minnesota district court judges whose salaries were ordered increased through a state supreme court decision upholding the pay increase bill passed by the last legislature, will not receive the additional money for at least two years, Ray P. Chase, state auditor, predicted Friday. "There was no money appropriated to cover these increases," Mr. Chase explained. "Payment must wait until the money is available."

Feed Supply for Stock

There are few classes of live stock that can pay returns for purchased feeds. This is particularly true if the purchased feeds are roughages or feeds that can be readily grown in the community. The late summer months reveal the probable supplies of feed for the coming winter. A little thought may indicate ways in which adequate supplies of rough feeds can be assured for all classes of live stock that are to be wintered.

Cleveland, Ohio.—"After having my first baby, I lost weight, no matter what I did. Then a doctor told me I would be better if I had another baby, which I did. But I got worse, was always sickly and went down to 98 pounds. My neighbor told me about Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, as it helped her very much, so I tried it. After taking four bottles, I weigh 116 pounds. It has just done wonders for me and I can do my housework now without one bit of trouble."—MRS. M. RIESSINGER, 10004 Nelson Ave., Cleveland, Ohio.

Humor Found Even in Somber English Jails

Rev. Eustace Jervis, at one time or another chaplain at some of the largest English jails, tells these two stories in his book, "Twenty-five Years in Six Prisons":

There was a very refined but sad-looking doctor at one prison. A man who was under sentence of death complained of toothache. He asked the doctor if he would take the tooth out for him. The doctor looked at him sadly for a moment or two, and said:

"Do you really think that it is worth while?"

A wife whose husband was "doing" three years wrote that she would have nothing to do with him when he came out. She said she had met a very nice gentleman, who had taken her and the three children to live with him. They had tea for dinner every night, he took them to the pictures, and had bought the children new clothes and boots. She had never been so happy and comfortable and cared for in her life. After bidding him farewell, she signed herself:

"Your broken-hearted wife, Clara."

Explained

"That stunning woman over there has been wanting to meet you all the evening."

"I know it, but I must refuse."

"I think you owe her an apology."

"No, I owe her allimony."—Boston Transcript.

FACTS
—AND THE OPEN MIND

THE MOST important element in business success—and the most difficult—is to be sure that you have all the facts before you act.

TO GET them all, from every possible source, is the first objective in General Motors. The Research Laboratories contribute some. These are nuggets, left in the crucible, after hundreds of ideas that looked good have been burned away. The Proving Ground contributes others. Dealers contribute. The public contributes. Every department contributes. Through the whole organization runs a spirit of inquiry and of rigid insistence on proof.

OUT OF such thinking come the new models announced from time to time by Chevrolet, Pontiac, Oldsmobile, Oakland, Buick, LaSalle, Cadillac—all with Fisher Bodies. And by Frigidaire, Each new model is a tested step forward. Nothing goes into it as a result of habit or guess or pride of opinion.

Nothing counts but hard-won facts, gathered and used with an open mind.

MINNESOTA BRIEFS

St. Paul—Loss was estimated at $450,000 as the result of the spectacular four-alarm fire which in five hours destroyed the main mill building of the St. Paul Milling company plant.

LeSueur Center—The LeSueur county area cattle test will start October 3, under supervision of the Minnesota livestock sanitary board and the federal department of agriculture.

Minneapolis—The steamer S. S. Thorpe left Minneapolis on its second downriver trip to St. Louis, stopping in St. Paul long enough to fill one of its three barges with grain.

St. Peter—The St. Peter Association, composed of 90 professional and business men, voted to donate $100 out of their treasury toward the erection of the new 4-H Club building at the state fair grounds.

Albert Lea—Organization for construction of a tuberculosis sanitarium was effected by representatives of Steele, Freeborn and Mower counties here, with several other counties as potential participants.

Lake Wilson—In an effort to keep school students in trim for their work, the board of education has issued an order regarding students attending dances. They are forbidden to attend public dances on any day preceding a school day.

Minneapolis—The board of regents accepted gifts of $14,000 to the University of Minnesota college of agriculture for the creation of scholarships and the establishment of a new loan fund.

St. Paul—There were 2,371 prisoners in Minnesota prisons January 1, this year, compared with 2,054 on the same date in 1926, and 1,634 January 1, 1923, according to a bulletin just issued by the federal census bureau.

Brainerd—More than 400 women will vie for honors here on October 15 in an achievement day clothing project exhibition. Instructions in the project were carried on during the summer. Several short plays will be included in the program.

Minneapolis—Propelling of a trolley car by remote radio control from an auto following at the rear and a voice from the clouds broadcast over station WCCO were the two outstanding features of the opening of the sixth annual Northwest Radio and Electric show.

Faribault—Proposal to erect a monument to the memory of General James Shields, founder of Shieldsville, near here, has focused attention on the exploits of the noted leader in Minnesota, who was the only man to serve as United States senator from three states.

St. Paul—Lost colonies of Minnesota fish, marooned in pockets through the ups and downs of the Mississippi river, are being rescued by the thousands, James F. Gould, state fish and game commissioner, said. State and federal governments both have crews in the field, carrying on the rescue.

Northfield—After a summer in the Black Hills, during which he preached before Presiden and Mrs. Coolidge, Rolf Lium has resumed the life of a student at Carleton College here. Lium was student patsor at Hermosa, S. D., and at his church the Coolidges worshiped weekly.

Springfield—A sauerkraut eating contest to decide the world championship will be an added feature of Sauerkraut day at Springfield, "the sauerkraut capital of the world," October 6, when Springfield expects to be host to even larger crowds than a year ago, when 7,000 persons ate 14 tons of kraut and 20,000 wieners.

Minneapolis—William B. Geery, deputy governor of the ninth district Federal Reserve bank of Minneapolis for the past seven years, was elected to the post of governor by the board of directors, to succeed Roy A. Young, appointed by President Coolidge as member of the Federal Reserve board at Washington.

Minneapolis—For use by its engineering school in their detailed study of the design, construction and operation of the most modern of automobiles, the Cadillac Motor Car Company has presented a cut-open chassis to the University of Minnesota. This engineers' masterpiece represents an investment said to total approximately $20,000.

Grove City—The Grove City airport will be the starting and finish point of a northwestern aerial derby to be staged October 15 and 16. Besides the 65-mile derby race to Litchfield, Paynesville, Willmar and finish at the airport, there will be stunt flying, wing walking, parachute jumping and other attractions.

Minneapolis—The University of Minnesota will bring a "friendly suit" against the state of Minnesota to settle the question of authority for university expenditures, it was decided by the board of regents at its regular meeting. The suit was instigated over the refusal of the state commission of administration and finance, otherwise known as the "big three," to approve of the faculty insurance item in the university budget.

Rhubarb requires large amounts of moisture for its best development, therefore it should be given thorough, clean cultivation.

Wanted to Be Asked Once More

By H. LOUIS RAYBOLD

(Copyright.)

IT IS not very pleasant to be the only girl in your crowd that isn't either married or engaged. Marion Gray sometimes felt philosophical about the matter when she looked about her and saw the sort of husbands, present or prospective, which her friends had chosen. She herself could have had Jack Rogers any day if she had not preferred to wait for a taller, handsomer, richer man.

It isn't to be wondered at that Marion read with great interest the following item in the Brainerd Sun:

"We hear that the new building on the corner of Main and Winter streets has been leased to the firm of Caldwell & Scobie, rising young architects, who will live, we understand, at Mrs. Weatherby's, so it seemed a foregone conclusion that there were two young bachelors coming to town. And as Mrs. Weatherby lived just across the street, Marion could not help but see them occasionally.

She saw them—from a distance—the very night they arrived. Both were presentable enough, but young Caldwell seemed to be the better looking. He walked wih an air and his clothes were the last word in cut, crease and color.

In the days which followed, the small town of Brainerd fairly laid itself out to please the newcomers. They got considerable business and a great deal of entertainment. There were even those who said it was ridiculous the way people fell all over two ordinary fellows.

"Personally," said Jack Rogers one evening to Marion as they set on the upper veranda step watching the moon rise—or at least Jack thought that was why they were sitting there. "I'm suspicious of people who come from goodness knows where. For all we know, they may be a couple of crooks!"

Marion almost choked with indignation. "You're absurd, Jack!" she cried.

"Especially that Caldwell guy," grumbled Jack. "Isn't he the mamma's boy! And there he is now, swinging his cane! And, by gosh, I do believe he's coming here!"

If Jack could only have known how big a favor his departure would have been to Marion, he would not have known whether to please her by going or punish her by staying.

As it was, he withdrew into a shell of reserve and heard Marion putting herself out to be agreeable to a stranger as she had never exerted herself to be agreeable to him.

And while he watched and listened, he evolved a scheme whereby, if Caldwell & Scoble were crooks, the fact should be uncovered. Nor is it going too far to say that he devoutly hoped they would indeed prove to be crooks. He had long been in love with Marion and was quite ready to go to any lengths to win her.

Before young Caldwell was even thinking of going home, Jack had risen and bade both of them a cool good night.

On the following morning Marion heard from various sources that Jack had left town, although he seemed to have told no one where he was going. For the first time in her life Marion's thoughts concerned themselves with his whereabouts.

A week passed and he did not return. During his absence Marion was frequently seen with Caldwell and her crowd got considerable kick out of wondering if he were really in love with her.

Marion herself wondered, too. She felt that she would say "yes," if he did ask her to marry him. Strangely, however, Jack with his mysterious absence had done more to advance his interests than he ever had with his presence. There were actually moments when Marion found herself weighing the two men and thinking that the scales tipped very little one way or the other.

Two weeks later Jack returned, as quietly as he had gone away.

He went straight to Marion. And had he not felt so miserable himself, he might have noticed that she looked—well, different, somehow.

As it was, he sank down in the couch hammock beside her and waited a moment, as if wondering just how to put what he was about to say.

Then, "I suppose I might as well get it off my chest," he began. "I've been tracing this Caldwell & Scoble firm from one town to another. They've certainly been around a lot. But I had no luck. That is—well, you see, if you were going to marry young Caldwell, I wanted to make sure before hand he was all straight and would make you happy. And I guess he is. Couldn't find a thing about either of them that wasn't O. K. So, if you love him, that's all there is to it."

Marion folded her slender hands about her knees. "That was kind of you, Jack," she said with a smile. "But you needn't have bothered. Mr. Caldwell told me last night he's engaged to Doris Scoble, his partner's sister."

Jack sighed with tremendous relief. "Thank heaven," he said. "Then we're just where we were before."

"Are we?" asked Marion with a laugh. "Oh, Jack, you old faithful, ask me to marry you just once more!"

The gold and silver in old jewelry, dental waste, tableware and other articles that are reused, amount to about $36,000,000 a year.

Bullet Brings Death While Girl Taunts

Mount Holly, N. C.—While Miss Dolly Rhodes sat beside him in an automobile and joked at his threats to kill himself, Randolph Gardner, twenty-four, member of a prominent Gaston county family, shot himself through the head, dying a few minutes later. The shooting occurred in front of the Rhodes residence.

Miss Rhodes, prostrated by the occurrence, could assign no reason. She said there had been no argument and that when Gardner put the pistol to his head and told her he was going to shoot she laughed at him, thinking he was joking, but that suddenly he pulled the trigger.

"TAME" WOLF KILLED AFTER LIVELY MIXUP

Animal's Brief Freedom Full of Excitement.

Philadelphia.—A wolf, which broke from its cage on a near-by farm, appeared on the lawn of the residence of C. G. Cholmeley-Jones, West Chester pike and Eagle road, Manoa, and started for Mrs. Cholmeley-Jones.

She promptly hurried over to the other side of the lawn, picked up her child, Gloria, three years old, and ran into the house. She then sent for the gardener, John Williams, negro, and when he appeared on the lawn, armed with a club, he found the wolf about to leap on Queenie, the valuable police dog of Mr. Cholmeley-Jones, chained at the side of the house.

As Williams started for the wolf, the animal stepped backward and bared its teeth, and when it seemed ready to leap, the gardener brought his club down on the animal's head, stunning it. He then ran into the garage and obtained an ax, with which he killed the animal. Harry Campbell, its owner, later said the wolf, which was nearly four feet long and weighing about 65 pounds, was a tame wolf and would not have injured anyone. He explained that it had broken loose from its cage on his farm.

Boy Scout Knew How to Treat Snake Bite

Greenwood Lake, N. J.—William Haast, sixteen years old, a Paterson boy scout, spending the summer with other scouts at Camp Alhtaha, tramped four miles through rattler and copperhead country to a marsh, where he set about the peaceful pursuit of berry picking. Just when he was leaning over for a particularly ripe berry there sounded the whirr of a rattler. He didn't have time to draw out of the way and the snake bit him on the left forearm.

Haast applied a hasty tourniquet above the bite. He had a bad tooth, so to suck snake poison was equivalent to being bitten. He took a small razor blade from his pocket and slashed about the bite and squeezed as much blood out as he could. Then he walked four miles through rattler country back to the camp.

He was pretty sick that night. The doctor said that he had done all that could be done for the bite, and so he left him alone. Next day William was well again and up and around.

Interrupted at Play, Child Slays Snake

Pittsburgh, Pa.—Carl Ross is only two years old but, according to his father, Clarence Ross, the child is an accomplished hunter, and already has to his credit one garter snake, measuring 14 inches.

Carl and his four-year-old brother, James, were playing in the yard of the Ross home here when a snake glided into sight. James ran for help. Carl picked up a hammer and started after the enemy. When aid arrived, he had vanquished the snake and was amusing himself by grinding its head into the ground.

Lightning Hits Crib; Leaves Child Unhurt

Binghamton, N. Y.—A peculiar freak of lightning occurred in Franklin, Delaware county, during a storm, when a bolt struck the home of Harry McKune, drove splinters into the bodies of Mr. and Mrs. McKune and twisted the iron frame of a crib, without injuring or awakening a child sleeping in it.

Dogs Ate His Church

Nome, Alaska.—A missionary in the interior, Rev. Andrew Knox, has written to friends that dogs have eaten part of his church. When recently called into the interior, he left a supply of dried fish for his dogs. Returning, he found the dogs had exhausted their food and had chewed up the walrus and reindeer hides that formed the walls of the church.

What Is This?

Doniphan, Neb.—Resembling a catfish in shape, but having four feet, with five toes on each foot, and six horns, three on each side of the head, an unusual creature was caught recently in a sandpit. Zoologists believe it is of the salamander family, but they have not seen a specimen like it.

Camel
Climbing to new heights of popularity

Government figures show that more Camels are being smoked today than ever before. One after another Camels passed them all.

If all cigarettes were as good as Camel you wouldn't hear anything about special treatments to make cigarettes good for the throat. Nothing takes the place of choice tobaccos.

Ups and Downs

Dr. Marvin Shie, who exposed, at the American Medical association's convention in Washington, the danger to the health of tattooed permanent flushes and tattooed red lips, said at a dinner in Cleveland:

"Our beauty doctors, with their enormous prices, damage a woman's bank account almost as badly as they damage her constitution.

"I heard a story the other day. A man said:

"'I understand that Mrs. Maturin Mayhew, the society leader, has had her face lifted.'

"'Is that so?' said a second man. 'I don't see any difference.'

"'Well,' said the first man, 'it fell again, I hear, when the beauty doctor sent in his bill.'"

Has Sunshine in Tomb

Mrs. Leila Hansell, wife of a North Carolina judge, was a strong believer in sunshine. Out in the sunlight, whenever possible, she also had a sunshiny disposition and spread this personal sunshine wherever she went, says Capper's Weekly. She died a few weeks ago, and in keeping with her request her body was placed in a tomb on top of the ground with a glass cover on it so that the sun may always shine on her remains.

The strange tomb at Hendersonville, N. C., is attracting tourists from all parts of the country.

Doris—Well, if you don't smoke or dance, you can't have much fun.

Wilbert—I've been watching you.

Specious Consolation

Dr. George West Russell, the Los Angeles economist, was condemning the growth of installment buying.

"We are becoming a nation of installment buyers," he said. "This means extravagance, recklessness and, perhaps, ultimate insolvency.

"Installment dealers offer us consolation; they point out the higher plane of living that installment buying allows; but to the thinker this consolation is as specious as the judge's.

"The judge, after condemning a poor duffer to 20 years' hard labor, said to him consolingly:

"'Oh, well, you know, we've all got to be somewhere.'"

Love is the only sure cure for feminine coquetry.

Carlson's Stores Throw Wide the Doors in a Great FALL OPENING SALE
—THE REWARD OF BEING TRUTHFUL—

There is an ancient proverb that says, "Help another, and you help yourself." Those are the truest words which were ever handed down to the human race.

At times like the present when the mailman brings advertisements of all kinds, it is hard for people to decide which is good and which is worthless. At this time we realize more than ever before that the integrity of the store sending out advertising is a big factor, as the public for the most part know what a value is when they see it.

In this our principle of truthful advertising will again find its reward in your interest and confidence when we say that here is the greatest opportunity ever offered to those who wish to dress richly and save money wisely.

We want to say to the people who live within a fifty mile radius of a Carlson store, that you cannot afford to miss this event. The purpose of this sale which is to further cement thrifty shoppers to us, has brought a determination that will not permit any disappointment to the public.

Our regular high hrade stock of merchandise which was fully replenished before the recent heavy advance in cotton will be offered to you with all the advantages of savings which we have already made. This foresight on our part will furnish you with savings that we intend will make you a friend of Carlson's Stores for life.

Service in Ringbo Sunday at 11 o'clock and in East Valley school house at 2 p. m.

The Ladies Aid of Ringbo will have their Annual Sale at church Saturday, October 22, at 1 o'clock. Lunch will be served. Everybody is welcome.

Nazareth Lutheran Church.

Sunday school at 10 o'clock.

The Ladies Aid of the Nazareth Lutheran church will meet in the church basement Friday, Oct. 28. Mrs. Chas. Hagglund and Mrs. H. O. Hanson will serve.

This month Moberg takes first place and Leiran second place. Last month it was just the opposite. They are close neighbors and evidently believe in sharing their honors as good neighbors should. The third man on the list is well known in this community, perhaps better known than anyone else that delivers cream to the Holt creamery. Mr. Langlie has always been a hard worker, and in my judgement a money maker. We all have our ups and downs in this world. Many of us haven't the courage to continue after we have had a failure or two. Mr. Langlie is not that kind, he can come back like few can and I give him much credit and a mighty good example for the rest of us to follow.

No. 4 on the list needs no introduction. J. H. Knutson no doubt is another man with sticking qualities. Any man that had the nerve and courage to settle down where he did should be looked up to. There has been times when flood waters tried to almost separate his family yet in spite of this, J. H. Knutson still remains on the place and as far as I know he isn't suffering from something to eat nor is he worrying a great deal about the future.

No. 5 on this list, M. J. Lunke, has a record in this creamery that is worthy of mention, in fact he should be given a silver cup or some remembrance from the creamery. This is what it is. Lunke is the only patron of this creamery that never was off the payroll since the opening day. Just imagine what it means to the creamery to have a patron of this kind. The creamery opened its doors for business July 15th, 1907, and Mr. Lunke has continued delivering his cream here ever since, and in this report he ranks 5th on the list, so it is plain to see that he hasn't given up the idea that dairying doesn't pay.

HOW MRS. WEAVER WAS HELPED

By Taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

As Mrs. Weaver herself says, "I was never very strong." This is a mild statement describing her condition, for, according to her letters, she was subjected to no small amount of ill health. Fortunately, her sister was familiar with Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and begged Mrs. Weaver to try it. "After three or four weeks," writes Mrs. Weaver, "I felt a great difference in myself. I would go to bed and sleep sound, and although I could not do very much work, I seemed stronger. I kept on taking it and now I am well and strong, do my work and take care of three children. I sure do tell my friends about your wonderful medicine, and I will answer any letters from women asking about the Vegetable Compound."—MRS. LAWRENCE WEAVER, East Smithfield St., Mt. Pleasant, Pa.

If you knew that thousands of women suffering from troubles similar to those you are enduring had improved their health by taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, wouldn't you think it was worth a trial?

In some families, the fourth generation is learning the merit of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

The Two Wives

Mrs. Whitney Warren, who was recently awarded the Legion of Honor for her war work, was talking at a luncheon in New York about an elderly millionaire widower who had become engaged to a chorus girl.

"His partner took him to task about this foolish engagement the other day," Mrs. Warren ended. "His partner said to him:

"'This won't be a happy marriage like your first one was, George. Your first wife was a real helpmate, but this chorus girl is out after your money.'

"The foolish millionaire widower laughed.

"'Yep,' he said, 'once I owed my success to my wife, now I owe my wife to my success.'"—Minneapolis Tribune.

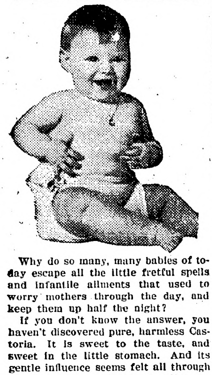
The BABY



Why do so many, many babies of today escape all the little fretful spells and infantile ailments that used to worry mothers through the day, and keep them up half the night?

If you don't know the answer, you haven't discovered pure, harmless Castoria. It is sweet to the taste, and sweet in the little stomach. And its gentle influence seems felt all through the tiny system. Not even a distasteful dose of castor oil does so much good.

Fletcher's Castoria is purely vegetable, so you may give it freely, at first sign of colic; or constipation; or diarrhea. Or those many times when you just don't know what is the matter. For real sickness, call the doctor, always. At other times, a few drops of Fletcher's Castoria.

The doctor often tells you to do just that; and always says Fletcher's. Other preparations may be just as pure, just as free from dangerous drugs, but why experiment? Besides, the book on care and feeding of babies that comes with Fletcher's Castoria is worth its weight in gold!

We both spoke at once at that, disclaiming any offense, and the doctor, after a glance at his watch, concluded by asking him to sit down, and offering him a cigar. I very much hoped that both these invitations would be declined, for with that girl in the next room and Wilkins' knock momentarily expected at the door, it was rather too close quarters to be comfortable. But my chief seemed to be perfectly at ease.

"I'll confess," he began, lighting a cigar of his own, "that I'm a little curious to know what caused your change of heart; what it was that convinced you that Phelps and I aren't engaged in a conspiracy to thwart justice."

"I am afraid I am a self-convicted egoist," said Ashton. "It took an hour or more for the thought to occur to me that there are other people, besides myself, living in The Meredith, and that Jane Perkins might have given that place as her address, without any reference to me whatever, might have given it in perfectly good faith. So when I came home to dinner I made some inquiries, and was cool enough by that time not to be overwhelmed with surprise to find that the address was apparently given in good faith. At any rate, there is a housemaid named Jane Perkins living in this hotel."

The doctor simulated no surprise over this announcement. He merely nodded calmly, and said:

"You will not have seen her yet, I suppose."

"So you know about her, too!" exclaimed Ashton. "And you were ahead of me again. Well, that's not remarkable; you kept your temper and I didn't. But though I haven't seen her yet, I don't believe you have, either, because I have been given to understand that it's her evening out."

"I suppose," said the doctor, "that you have taken precautions for apprehending her when she comes back?"

"Yes," said Ashton; "there's a man on watch in her room now. She won't go far. I understand she's been ill the greater part of the week."

The doctor smiled and waved his hand toward the telephone. "You may as well tell your man to go home," he said; "the girl's here."

Ashton sprang right out of his chair. "What's that!" he demanded. "You've got here here; hiding her from me?"

"If I were hiding her from you, I shouldn't have told you. No, she's not in hiding at all. She's doing up the bedrooms in this apartment. She'll come when I call her, which I mean to do in a very few minutes. When she comes, I mean to make a little examination of her mind to determine her actual connection with the crime."

"I suppose," said Ashton rather sarcastically, "that you won't mind my asking permission to contribute a few questions of my own to that examination."

"Not at all," said the doctor quite simply. "You may ask her anything you like."

There was a little silence. Then Ashton said impatiently.

"Well, what are you waiting for?"

"I'm expecting another visitor. When I heard your knock, I thought that you were he. It's none other than our friend Wilkins."

Ashton laughed. "Wilkins!" he repeated. "What do you want of him?"

The doctor glanced at his watch.

"I fancy that he's coming now. Why, Wilkins knows this girl, who is a stupid creature and rather easily alarmed. She'd be almost sure to be panic-stricken at the sight of these instruments. All ignorant persons are the same way." He paused and shot a derisive smile at Ashton. "They put them in the category of black-art and hocus-pocus, and regard them with a mixture of contempt and terror. But she has confidence in Wilkins, and by his submitting to be harnessed in the same way we propose to harness her, which he has agreed to do, it will quiet whatever fears she may have."

Ashton looked dubious. Already Wilkins had tapped on the door.

"Stop a bit, Phelps," said my chief as I started toward the door. "Look here, Ashton! Use a little plain common sense for a minute. You don't half believe yourself that this girl has any guilty connection with the crime. Which way will you find out the most? By making this girl feel that there's nothing to be afraid of; that we're simply investigating, and not accusing her at all? Or by putting her through an old-fashioned 'third degree'?"

"All right," said Ashton; "have it your own way, only I'll have my way tomorrow."

"There won't be any need of that," said my chief. "The Oak Ridge mystery is going to be solved tonight, and in this room; solved down to the last detail. Open the door, Phelps."

I imagine that Ashton himself was not more surprised by the doctor's prophecy than I was. To be sure I had penetrated further into the mystery than Ashton had. I had shared with my chief the knowledge of Jane Perkins' strange other self. I knew that the mysterious, savage creature in fulfilling an oath, which to her must have possessed a religious sanctity, had committed what our more civilized society called a crime. And yet I felt sure that Doctor McAlister meant more than that when he had promised Ashton the whole solution of the mystery. The heart, the essence of the mystery was still unsealed. By some process of reasoning, or intuition, which I had not followed, my chief held that secret, still unsolved, in the hollow of his hand, and he meant to reveal it to us before the night was out.

I opened the door and told Wilkins to come in. I had an impression that he started a little at the sight of Ashton; and I didn't at all wonder, since I remembered the tacit understanding between ourselves and him, that this examination of the girl was to be for the purpose of shielding her against the district attorney, rather than of betraying her to him.

"I Suppose," Said the Doctor, "That You Have Taken Precautions for Apprehending Her When She Comes Back?"

But I had very little leisure for reflecting on Wilkins' fears or misgivings, because, almost before I had closed the door behind him, I heard the doctor call out, "Perkins."

Well as I understood his experiments, and confident as I was in the success of them, I found it hard to go on breathing steadily while I waited for the response to the call that was to come from the inner room. Would it be Jane Perkins in her own proper person who would appear in the doorway in answer to the call, or would the occupant of her body prove to be that other, wilder soul?

When she answered, "Coming, sir," I drew in a deep breath of relief, for it was the voice of the girl who used and abused English as her mother-tongue. The next moment she was in the doorway. She was not Fanenna, not the girl who, with green, blazing eyes, had flung that defiant challenge back at the doctor only a few minutes before. And yet, she was not precisely Jane Perkins either, not the stodgy, thick-witted housemaid who had giggled with such unalloyed delight as she fished for the doctor's knife in the vase of water. The girl who stood there now looking at us had thoughtful, troubled eyes. Something—an elusive memory, a nameless emotion, a vague, fluid thing that would not crystallize was perplexing her. She was trying to think, which is something I am willing to wager that Jane Perkins had never done in her life.

Naturally, the first person I looked at when I withdrew my eyes from her was Ashton. He was looking straight into her face, and it was the same face, in a purely physical way, that he had seen the night he went to the hospital with us. It was not until I saw the look of blank indifference depicted upon his own that the realization was forced upon me that he would not recognize her any better than I had done. From him my gaze flashed round to the doctor, and on the way it took in Wilkins. Both of them were watching her, both, I guessed from their faces, had noted the same indefinable difference that had struck me. It was the doctor who spoke.

"Perkins," he said, "here is Mr. Ashton. He is one of the assistants to the district attorney, and he and I and Mr. Phelps here are interested in trying to find out something about the murder which took place at Oak Ridge a few nights ago."

"Murder!" she cried with a gasp. "I don't know nothin' about any murder, sir."

"No," said the doctor, "I'm quite sure you don't. But we think it possible that you know some things which will help us to find out who the murderer is. Are you willing to help us?"

She hesitated a moment, then turned quite frankly to Wilkins.

"Is it all right, Mr. Wilkins?" she asked. Then quickly turned back to the doctor. "I beg your pawdon, sir, for askin' such a question, but I know Mr. Wilkins, and if he says it's all right—"

"It's all right, Jane," he assured her. "I came up here a purpose so that there'd be nothing for you to worry about."

"All right, sir," she said, turning once more to Doctor McAlister. "I'll be glad to tell you anything I know, I'm sure, though I don't see how what I know can help much, unless—" She frowned and rubbed the back of one hand across her forehead.

"Unless what?"

"Nothin', sir. I seem to be thinkin' of all sorts of curious things, as if my mind was tryin' to wander like."

The doctor laughed. "We're all that way sometimes," he said. "Sit down in this big chair."

She obeyed a little reluctantly. Whether it was a half-memory of it that troubled her, or merely the instinctive hesitation of one of her class to make herself comfortable in our presence, I did not know.

The doctor busied himself with his instruments. The girl watched him rather nervously.

"I beg pawdon, sir," she said. "Are you goin' to do anything with those? I don't exactly like the looks of 'em, sir; all those queer lookin' machines. Is it anything like goin' to the dentist's?"

"Nothing in the world," laughed the doctor. "These machines don't hurt. Here, Wilkins, sit down in this chair beside her, and we'll harness you up, too."

He hung up before the girl one of the pair of little telephones that we had used in our association test on Harvey. Then he turned his attention to Wilkins, who had seated himself readily enough in the chair the doctor had designated.

"That's a very impressive looking machine, sir," the man commented. "May I ask what name it's called by?"

"Its name is just as impressive as it is," replied the doctor. "It is called a recording phonopneumosphygmograph."

Up to that moment Ashton had kept perfectly quiet, but at the sound of that portentous word he burst into a roar of laughter, which Wilkins decorously and respectfully echoed. I laughed frankly myself. What the purpose of the instrument might be, I had no idea, but the prodigious name which the doctor assigned to it struck me as nothing more than a flight of his rather grotesque fancy.

"Well, sir," said Wilkins, "it will have to accomplish a good deal to live up to that name."

That my chief had, by no means, exhausted his store of surprises, became evident when he began his examination of the girl. There was nothing psychological about it. He questioned her very much as Ashton would have done.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

African Prickly Pear Has Its Good Points

The prickly pear is said to be so tenacious of life that a leaf or even a small portion of a leaf, if thrown on the ground, strikes out roots within a short time and becomes the parent of a fast-growing plant.

Mischievous though the African prickly pear may be, it is not without its good qualities. Its juicy fruit, though rather deficient in flavor, is delightfully cool and refreshing in the dry heat of summer, and a kind of treacle is made from it.

Great caution is necessary in peeling this curious fruit, the proper way being to impale the fruit on a fork or stick while one cuts it open and removes the skin. The person who undertakes to pluck this treacherous fruit with unguarded fingers meets with an experience he does not soon forget. Concentrated essence of stinging nettle seems all at once to assail hands, lips and tongue, and the skin wherever it comes in contact with the ill-natured fruit, is covered with a group of minute bristly hairs, apparently growing from it, and venomous and irritating to the last degree.

In dry weather these spiteful little stings do not even wait for the newly arrived victim, but fly about, light as thistle-down, ready to settle on anyone who has not learned by experience to give the prickly-pear a wide berth.

Ingredients for Jelly

Scientific study of the principles of jelly making has shown that three ingredients are required for the formation of a jelly, namely, sugar, acid and pectin; and these must be present in fairly definite proportions. Tart apples, cranberries, red currants and grapes, when collected at the proper stage of ripeness, contain pectin and acid in sufficient quantity to form a good jelly when cooked for a short time with the proper amount of sugar.

We put too much faith in systems and look too little to men.—Benjamin Disraeli.

MINNESOTA BRIEFS

Lake City—The present harbor at Lake City is adequate for such river traffic as the city will have, Major R. C. William, United States engineer in St. Paul, reported in disapproving a plan for harbor improvement which he estimates at $500,000.

Minneapolis—All former trade show records in Minneapolis were broken when the total attendance at the sixth annual Northwest Radio and Electrical Show during the last week was announced at more than 65,000 persons.

St. Paul—Retirement of Edward Lees, state Supreme Court commissioner, since 1918, because of ill health, and the appointment of District Judge I. M. Olsen of New Ulm to fill the vacancy was announced by Chief Justice Samued B. Wilson.

St. Charles—With an explosion that rattled the windows of his house and was heard three miles, a silo on the John Dyar farm near here blew up causing damage estimated at $3,000. Spontaneous combustion of ensilage fumes is blamed for the explosion.

The governor submitted first to an abdominal operation and after recovering from that his tonsils were removed.

Minneapolis—A total of 69,702 cars of grain, valued at around $100,000,000, rolled into Minneapolis and Duluth during September, believed to be the biggest volume marketed at the terminals in any September of northwest history. The 69,702 cars would make 930 solid trains of grain, figuring the number per train at 75 cars, a fair average on northwest railroads.

Northfield—With a freshman class of 337, the enrollment at Carleton College is now above the 820 mark, and students are registered from 26 states, the District of Columbia and seven foreign countries. Students are here from Canada, China, Czechoslovakia, Japan, Norway, Natal, and Cape Province, South Africa.

Bemidji—Loss estimated in excess at $100,000 was caused when fire destroyed the building and stock of the Bemidji hardware company. An explosion of unknown origin spread the flames to every part of the building and families living in apartments on the second floor were compelled to escape in night attire.

Minneapolis—Methods of procuring favorable legislation to provide "sunset homes" for the aged were discussed at a statewide dinner given by the Commonwealth club at the West hotel and before the meeting adjourned Dr. Roy L. Smith was elected president of the Minnesota Sunset Homes association, which was formed by representaives from all parts of the state.

Winona—Three thousand immigrants and all young married couples, will reach Minnesota, coming from the wilds of central Europe. They are Hungarian partridges, purchased by Dr. F. S. James of Winona, at a cost of $14,000. Mr. James is chairman of the Izaak Walton League committee sponsoring the movement to restock the wilds of Minnesota with game birds.

Minneapolis—Business volume in the northwest increased 20 per cent during September, compared with a year ago, according to tabulations by the Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis. The compilations are based on check payments in 17 representative cities, scattered in typical sections of Minnesota, western Wisconsin, North and South Dakota and Montana.

Lake City—The area which the Upper Mississippi River Wild Life and Fish refuge is to embrace includes the bottom lands of the Mississippi and islands in the river from approximately the foot of Lake Pepin to Rock Island, Ill. This strip is nearly 300 miles long and from one to three or four miles wide. It embraces about 200,000 acres of territory of the character that congress intended should be included in the refuge.

Minneapolis—The dispersal auction of the famous Pabst Hollyhock Holstein herd, established an average of $850 a head, considered by breeders to be the highest average for any herd in recent years. The sale was attended by farmers and breeders from 38 states. The 115 head sold for more than $90,000. F. E. Murphy, Minneapolis, was the largest individual buyer, paying $20,600 for cattle. The largest portion of the herd will go to Minnesota, as catte men from the Gopher state spent $31,600.

Marking Passage of Time

It was the first day of school and Gordon, who is now in the second grade, brought his little brother, Arthur, to school with him to start in the first grade. The teacher said to Gordon: "How old is Arthur?" Gordon answered: "I don't know, but we've had him to three fairs."

New England Claims Peony

No flower is associated more closely with New England than the peony, partly because it grows unusually well there, but more particularly for the reason that many of the finest varieties have been originated in that section. For years Boston was the peony center of the entire country, and even yet stands close to the top, although several sections in the West are coming to the front.

STRAIGHT TALKS WITH AUNT EMMY

ON FRANCINE'S THRIFT

As Helen settled herself in Aunt Emmy's big chair she said: "Jack Hunt has bought the Briggs place. I never was so astonished in my life. Jack didn't have a dollar when he married Francine and now he's bought a house."

"Well, my dear, it's not so surprising to me. Francine is responsible for their prosperity."

"Why, Aunt Emmy, I thought she was awfully frivolous. I remember how disappointed I was when Jack married her. She seemed entirely too pretty and too well dressed to be a good wife. When I dined at their house I thought she was frightfully extravagant about her table. She must have paid her cook a lot to have the food she served."

Aunt Emmy smiled. "I liked Francine from the first," she said. "She and I became good friends. She told me how worried she was because Jack did not seem to think of the future and never tried to save money. Everything about housekeeping was so new to her that she was glad to come to me with her little problems. I advised her to save regularly, no matter how hard it might be. She coaxed Jack to open an account at the bank for her household money. He thought it was silly because they had so little. She said she could keep more accurate accounts if she had a bank account. He said they didn't have enough to keep track of. She insisted she wanted to learn to keep accounts. Then, when they got rich, she'd know how.

"I don't need to tell you how they prospered. Three of the sweetest children in the world, and now a house! Jack is proud as he can be."

"Yes," interrupted Helen, "but how did she do it?"

"The very first week after she started her checking account at the bank she took the money she saved and opened a savings account in the thrift department, where she got interest on her savings. You see, she was determined to save at least 10 per cent of her income. She saved steadily. She asked me to help her plan things out and together we worked out a budget, so she could divide her income to meet her expenses. When her plan was working well she told Jack.

"He was tickled to death. Then he began to save too. Francine wanted a real home. They saved for that. They have been married six years now and they haven't a debt in the world. That excellent food, my dear, was all prepared by Francine herself, just as her pretty clothes are made by her from remnants and odds and ends she picks up at bargain prices."—A. B. Aymes.

Drink With Sticks

An ancestor to the straw through which we sip our sodas has been discovered in East Africa, says Popular Science Monthly. Yak trees there have cavities in their trunks in which rain water collects. The natives frequently carry "drinking sticks" two feet long and half an inch in diameter, which they use to sip the water out of the trees.

Desserts for Foxes

On a fox farm near Los Angeles the animals seem to prefer fruit, especially oranges and apples. Foxes that are being raised for their pelts are fed a richer diet than the others and they are killed in December when their fur is at its best. The food given consists of bread and milk as a regular ration, with an occasional extra of eggs and raw meat with the fruit for dessert.

Investments and Citizenship

A neighbor tells how his savings in Public Utilities are Benefiting him.

HE SAYS:

1 I am proud of the Community in which I dwell. I delight in its growth and forward movement. I like to feel that I have a hand in making these things possible, through my modest investment in the stock of the Power and Light Company.

2 With this local investment comes a sense of security. Day by day, before my eyes, I have concrete evidences of the manner of use to which my money is put. The soundness of my judgement is reflected in the substantiality of the growth all about me.

3 I like to be able to see my money grow and my pride of ownership increases as I see new cables and wires stretching farther and farther into new suburbs and divisions.

4 Last, but not least, I consider that my return of 7 per cent. on my investment is a satisfactory one—a better return than I can obtain on other securities of any where near equal safety. These quarterly dividend checks help to pay my electric light bills.

THE DOG RANGE AND WOLVES

(© by D. J. Walsh.)

LOTH had removed the bandage and washed the wound when he heard voices. Somehow, coming just now, they made him uneasy. He had seen blood on the muzzle of Range that morning.

He would have called Ann, but she was in the other room looking after Izette, who was nearly as bad off as Champ.

The voices were approaching. Loth examined the wound carefully. It was satisfactory and he replaced the bandages with fresh ones.

His rifle was in a corner, but he was just as good with revolvers at their range, and they were handier.

The outside door opened in this room and the one into the other was closed. Izette had been restless during the night and her sister wished to shut out sounds. Loth bent over his patient.

"Remember, you're a man, Champ," he said in a low voice, "more than twelve years old. Your sister Ann has hardly slept in a week. I hoped if Izette could get quiet that Ann might find some rest today. Try not to disturb them, no matter what you hear outside."

The boy nodded, his steady eyes regarding the man intently.

"Of course," he assented, "but it's odd Izette's worse off, when she was wounded like me."

"You don't quite understand," gently. "Izette's only a little girl, while you're a big, strong man. Besides, she had a bad fall when you stumbled over the high bank in the darkness. It was a terrible experience for a little girl to go through."

Again the boy nodded, his eyes still regarding the man. In them were devotion and hero worship.

"S'pose 'twas pretty bad, she being only seven. But I'm thinkin' now how funny 'twas you happened to be there right in the nick o' time."

"I was sort of looking out."

"Like you was when the bull moose charged me an' I was saved from being a goner, an' when I took the cub an' papa an' mamma grizzly rushed for me not ten yards off. You came from behind a rock, but didn't have time for anything 'cept to grab me, cub an' all, an' jump forty feet from the cliff into the river. That was busy fun's I ever had. The odd thing was that you happened to be—sort of lookin' out. An' there's been other times."

"You never told your sister anything about—me being there?" quickly.

"Course not. You told me not to. But I never could see why. Once I heard you say you liked Ann, an' I know she likes darin' things. She's that way herself. I don't guess Ann ever had any thought 'bout you being in the country till that night the wolves chased us—an' still, I don't know. Ann's mighty quick to scent out things, though what she finds out she keeps to herself, mostly." The boyish eyes grew perplexed. "I don't see what you stay off so for," he complained, almost fretfully. "You ain't scared of grizzlies nor anything in the world 'cept just Ann, an' she's gentle as—as anything, an' the best girl in the world, if she is my sister. I wish we could go back to our old home in the forest away from this crowded-together country an' the schoolin' sis brought us for. 'Taint no good here, with four houses right in sight of each other an' not so many miles apart. We 'long to the woods, not to fussin' close neighborhoods. What I wish for more'n anything else in all this world is for you an' her to get friends, an' then you build a cabin right near to us. Then you an' me could go huntin' an' fishin' an' you could teach me whiles. An' Ann could teach me some, too. Both of you know moren't that teacher who come to get us t'other day. Said she got 50 cents a month for teaching, an' had twelve. Talked so much 'bout me an' Izette havin' to come that I up an' told her she didn't know as much as either of you, an' then she said what could folks expect for $6 a month an'—"

"Gr-r-rrh—" came a hoarse rumble from without.

"That's Range," said Loth quietly, with a hard glint in his eye the boy didn't see. "Very likely Range couldn't find any game in the woods round here, and has come back for his breakfast. I'll go and see."

"Breakfast—that growl!" scorned the boy, after Loth had slipped out and closed the door softly behind him. "It's a grizzly growl, a dozen grizzlie- growl. He rumbled like that when he faced the pack of wolves."

It was a pack of wolves Range was facing now. His fangs showed, and from behind them came the deep rumble of battle.

Six men were closing round in front, all with rifles. Loth stepped before the dog.

"Out of the way," ordered the leader of the assailants, harshly. "That's a sheep killer, an' we want him."

"Sick children in here, as maybe you know," Loth said, in lowered voice.

"We'll walk off a little way."

"Then bring the dog along," threateningly. "He's killed two sheep, one last night and one the night before an' now we're out for him. Get me?"

Loth didn't answer. He walked 300 or 400 yards, dropping a hand now and then upon the dog's head to keep him on the side away from the men. Not even the mistress or the young master had such control over the big dog as Loth. Though he had lived apart from the forest home and kept himself hidden for the most part, he and the dog had gone on many a hunt together.

"Now, men, I want a little talk with you," he said, when he stopped and faced them.

"All right," was the surly answer, "when we've killed that ugly brute. Either he'll fly at us or make a dash into the woods, whar no one could find him. Two sheep—"

"I don't often ask a favor of any man," said Loth, still quietly, "but I do now. Let me tell—"

"Stand away from that dog or we'll—hey, what!" for two revolvers were menacing them.

"Let your weapons drop on the ground," coldly. "The first one who lifts one so much as an inch I'll drop. This dog beside me is worth the whole bunch of you, and rather than have him killed I will kill you all. That's right," as the rifles rattled to the ground. "Now, hands up, quick, and listen! I was willing to talk fair, but you're a set of cheap—"

"Careful," broke in the one who had spoken first. "I'm sheriff, an' all but two of these are my dep'ties. The other two are owners of the killed sheep. We've heard tell something 'bout you, Hank Loth, an' the way ye handle weepons, an' something 'bout your demon dog that tackles an' kills a b'ar. We counted for trouble, mebbe. That's why I say be careful. We're the law. The whole gov'ment is back of us. It's like this—first, we kill the dog, then we talk if you want to—though it's likely we'll punish ye some for contempt of court."

His hands were commencing to lower when something in the eyes behind the barrels caused them to stiffen up spasmodically.

"D—don't shoot," he stuttered. "I'm sh-sh-sheriff. It's high treason."

"All right," evenly, "I've changed my mind about putting up fairness to you. You're not intelligent and human enough for that. I had thought of fastening the dog except when out with him and offering his wonderful record against two sheep. Range is so intelligent that I could soon teach him the difference between sheep and wild animals. But, that would be above your heads. So I'll just mention a few things and let you go. To my personal knowledge Range has saved more than twenty lives, and I don't know half his history. About the house he is as gentle as a kitten and perfectly safe with children. Miss Candish was bringing her brother and sister nearer to civilization in hope of better schooling for them. She had always lived in the remote forest with her father, who was an ardent naturalist and hunter. After he died they preferred to remain until now. Coming here, a pack of wolves attacked them, and but for the dog, with a little help from me, all would have been killed. It seems to me such a dog, with nothing against him but two paltry sheep, for which he isn't really to blame, should—"

"Be killed!" yelled the sheriff as Loth's face half turned at a step behind. The man had been waiting for any possible chance, and now his hand darted for his rifle. But before it could be raised to a level a shot rang out, the bullet evidently striking the barrel, for there was a clink of metal, a howl from the man and the weapon fell back to the ground.

"Hold your hands up again, high," called a clear, girlish voice. "Mr. Loth, you go and search them for revolvers. Draw charges from them and from the rifles and take away all their ammunition. Then we'll start them down the slope and if they come back shoot them. They act to me more like a gang of desperadoes than officers."

"We'll show what we are when we come back," raged the sheriff.

"We have two good rifles waiting," warned the girl, "and you're the man they'll pick."

She waited calmly until they were out of sight, then whirled to Loth.

"There's the boat we poled up the river the last forty miles," she cried. "The current back is swifter than we could go, even if we had horses. Then we'll strike straight into the woods to the old forest home. We'll all love to go back and you can educate the children. Don't you understand?" at the look on his face. "Father's dead and his position is gone, and I—I've changed my mind. I've known all the time that you were watching over us, out of sight, and—have liked it. We'll be married at the old minister's on the way back. Now, let's hurry. The children are well enough to start in the boat."

Spontaneous Combustion

When large quantities of soot, linen, paper, cotton or woolen stuff, ship's cables, etc., become soaked with relatively small amounts of oils (especially drying oils) and are exposed to a limited access of air, they may take fire sooner or later. The presence of moisture, frequently aids spontaneous combustion, and piles of damp hay, freshly mown grass, sometimes take fire spontaneously. The phenomenon is not, however, without a clearly defined cause. Fats and oils can be shown to undergo a slow process of combustion at but slightly elevated temperatures. Combustion of a small amount of oil causes the evolution of a corresponding amount of heat; rise of temperature accelerates the combustion, producing a further degree of heat, until at a given moment the temperature may become so high as to cause the mass to burst into flame.

Guiding Young Minds in Scientific Paths

A moving picture sample of the activities of little children learning by the laboratory method "try it and see" is being featured in London in an unusual campaign. Malting House school, originally started by faculty members of Cambridge university for their own offspring as a place where young children could "learn how to learn," has proved so successful that the directors wish to expand it into a new type of educational research. To show parents who are interested in experimental schools what can be done to retain the emotional and intellectual drive of the "ask question age," movies of a specimen week at Malting house have been put on view for a private showing. The directors, who include such men as Sir Ernest Rutherford, former winner of the Nobel prize for physics, and J. B. S. Haldane, essayist and biologist, recently attracted wide attention toward the school by advertising in leading scientific journals for a scientist "of the first order . . . to investigate and conduct the introduction of young children to science and scientific method."

More Land O'Lakes Butter Needed

The name "Land O'Lakes" has made many new markets for co-operative creamery butter of high quality. People are now asking for it by name in eighty of the leading cities of the United States.

While Land O'Lakes Creameries will sell over eighty million pounds of butter this year, it is not enough to fill the demand created for good butter through the Land O'Lakes system of manufacturing and marketing.

The 425 member creameries of Land O'Lakes Creamery Association have worked together for six years. They have met with splendid success because these member creameries have been successful in their creamery work for an average of over twenty-five years.

The successful co-operative marketing of their butter is only a natural step in their progress.

Through working together with one standard for manufacturing and marketing, a higher average price has been received for butter based on market quotations than was ever received by co-operative creameries during any same length of time before Land O'Lakes was organized.

Through a wider and more systematic distribution the general price level of butter has been raised.

Land O'Lakes Creameries need more Land O'Lakes butter —100 more co-operative creameries should join Land o' Lakes this coming year. Their butter is needed for the increased demand.

Creamery Boards or anyone desiring information on Land O'Lakes methods, are invited to visit Land O'Lakes headquarters in Minneapolis and see the way the butter is handled, —graded by the government,—laboratory tests,—the print room turning out as high as seven carloads of print butter a day. It's a splendid demonstration of what farmers can do by working together. Give your patrons first hand information before their next annual creamery meeting. Land O'Lakes Creameries is pleased to have the farmers vote on whether their creamery shall become a member.

The record of Land O'Lakes Creameries covering six years work is an open book for any creamery board or farmer who wishes to see the results of co-operative marketing on a large scale.

"How best can I trade in my present car for a new car?"

WHEN you are ready to trade in your present car for a new car, you naturally want full value for your present car. But most of all you want full new car value.

It will therefore pay you to consider varying trade-in allowance offers in the light of these basic facts:

1 Your present car has only one fundamental basis of value: i.e., what the dealer who accepts it in trade can get for it in the used car market.

2 Your present car has seemingly different values because competitive dealers are bidding to sell you a new car.

3 The largest allowance offered is not necessarily the best deal for you. Sometimes it is; sometimes it is not.

4 An excessive allowance may mean that you are paying an excessive price for the new car in comparison with its real value.

5 First judge the merits of the new car in comparison with its price, including all delivery and finance charges. Then weigh any difference in allowance offered on your present car.

6 Remember that you are making a purchase—not a sale. You are buying a new car and simply using your present car as a credit against the new car's purchase price.

Esther Mork Died At Tacoma, Wash.

Esther Mork, aged 17, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. S. Mork, died Tuesday, Oct. 4, at a Tacoma hospital after a prolonged illness. Esther attended the Sumner High School until her health failed, and was a member of the Christian church and of the Order of the Rainbow. She is survived by her parents, two brothers, Arthur and Warren of Sumner, and three sisters, Mrs. Thelma Meeker of Chicago, Mrs. Mathilda Burrows of Tacoma, and Verna Mork, at home.

The following expression of sympathy is by one of the neighbors of the Mork's, and gives a testimony of the love which was felt for Esther in the neighborhood south of Sumner where she lived.

"The sympathy of the whole neighborhood is with Mr. and Mrs. Mork in this bereavement, the loss of the third daughter within a little more than a year. Little Eleanor, who died a year ago this summer, was a most unusual child, so gentle and so thoughtful of others. She was loved by everyone and as one of the neighbors expressed herself, 'I could love her as my own child.' Mrs. Mary Gay, who died just a few weeks ago, was a most charming and cultured young woman, and one who made many friends. And now Esther, girl of marked attainments and very popular in her church, school, social and club life; a great favorite with everyone. Her death has cast a gloom over the neighbors with whom she lived, and they all wish to express their deep sorrow for Mr. and Mrs. Mork in the loss of three such beautiful and talented girls.

Funeral services were held in the Christian church, Rev. J. E. Carlson officiating, and enterment was made in the Woodbine cemetery near Puyallup, beside her sister.

Two Fords Collided Near Rosewood Last Friday

Martin Jarshaw and Ingvald Dahl, farmers residing southwest of Holt, had a head-on collision with their Ford touring cars near Rosewood Friday evening. Mr. Dahl was on the right side of the road and had brought his car almost to a standstill, when he noticed Mr. Jarshaw coming towards him on his side. Mr. Jarshaw claimed that he did not see Mr. Dahl, and therefore paid for all the damages, which consisted of a smashed up front end on each of the Fords.

Smashed Frontwheel

H. M. Nubson had a close call the other night while driving on the highway near the Dovre farm east of town. Somehow his car crawled down in the ditch and hit an old dredge shoe which had been left there. Mr. Nubson's control of the car saved him from a tipover and possibly a bad smash-up. As it was, he smashed the front wheel and bent the front axle. The car was fixed at the local garage, and is on the road again, the same as ever.

Moved to Town

Arvid Peterson and family, who have been making their home on a farm five miles north of town this summer, moved into the Per Reierson residence in town here last week. Mr. Peterson is the state highway patrolman on the north section out of Holt, succeeding Mr. Brenna.

Shipped Three Carloads Of Livestock Saturday

The Holt Co-operative Livestock Shipping Association is a live and up-to-date co-operative organization, which was shown again last week when they shipped out three more carloads of livestock to Saint Paul. This is the second time the association has shipped three carloads of stock at one time, since it was organized.

I. Ostlund and Elmer Odie filled one of the cars in this shipment with sheep raised on their farms in the Mud Lake territory, which goes to prove another thing; namely, that Mud Lake is all right for raising livestock.

Cow Testing Report St. Louis County

One of the newest members of the St. Louis County Cow testing association has made the best record for butterfat production during September, reported A. W. Aamodt, county agent. One of his cows won the high individual test, the herd won second rating in the butterfat average and four of his cows were in the class producing more than forty pounds of fat during the month.

The report of Homer O. Tague, official tester, follows: Three hundred and nine cows were tested during September, producing an average of 645 pounds of milk and 26.2 pounds of butterfat.

The five highest producing herds in the association were owned by F. W. Hutchinson, whose herd averaged 859 pounds of milk and thirty-seven pounds of butterfat; Carl Christoferson's herd, 701 pounds of milk and 31.8 pounds of butterfat; M. C. Francisco's herd 702 pounds pounds of milk and 30.5 pounds of butterfat; Russell Farm's herd, 831 pounds of milk and 28 pounds butterfat; John P. Partanen's herd, 751 pounds of milk and 27.7 of butterfat.

The highest producing cow milked twice daily was owned Mr. Christoferson. This cow produced 1,221 pounds of milk and 59.8 pounds of butterfat. The highest producing cow milked three times a day was owned by St. Louis county poorfarm. It produced 1,524 pounds of milk and 51.8 pounds butterfat.

Forty-nine cows in the association producod over 40 pounds of butterfat during September.

Mr. Christoferson, named in the above report moved to Duluth from here eight years ago and started up a dairy farm, which he is having good success with. Mr. Chrisoferson spent a couple of weeks here recently visiting with relatives and, while here called at the News office and gave us this report. He was much surprised to find this community with so many dairy farms without a cow testing association.

A chicken car with about half a carload of chickens in it, was set off here by the freight last Thursday. Enough chickens were hauled over here from Newfolden by truck to fill the car, which was shipped out of here Saturday.

The BABY

No mother in this enlightened age would give her baby something she did not know was perfectly harmless especially when a few drops of plain Castoria will right a baby's stomach and end almost any little ill. Fretfulness and fever, too; it seems no time until everything is serene.

That's the beauty of Castoria; its gentle influence seems just what is needed. It does all that castor oil might accomplish, without shock to the system. Without the evil taste It's delicious! Being purely vegetable, you can give it as often as there's a sign of colic; constipation: diarrhea; or need to aid sound, natural sleep.

Just one warning: it is genuine Fletcher's Castoria that physicians recommend. Other preparations may be just as free from all doubtful drugs but no child of this writer's is going to test them! Besides, the book on care and feeding of babies that comes with Fletcher's Castoria is worth its weight in gold.

The Green Cloak

By YORKE DAVIS

WNU Service. Copyright, 1926

His first questions were about the cloak; where she had bought it, and whether, so far as she knew, there were a good many others like it. The girl's whole interest, as shown by her replies, appeared to be to perfect her identification of it. She admitted, reluctantly, that hundreds of them had been sold in the city that fall; admitted that she herself had seen dozens on the street, the counterpart of it in cut and in color. But this particular cloak, she protested, she knew without a doubt to be her own. It was badly rumpled and had been exposed to the weather, was hardly fit to wear any more, but, notwithstanding these facts, she knew that it was hers.

"Was it in good condition the last time you wore it?"

"It looked as good as new."

"Then how can you be sure that the one which was advertised as found is the same one?"

Well, she was sure, and she proceeded to demonstrate the fact by a multitude of details—some of her own sewing, and a patch on the lining which she could not mistake.

"How did you come to lose the cloak?"

"I don't know, sir," she answered. "I just wish I did. I think one of the other housemaids stole it, sir, or borrowed it and didn't bring it back. I suppose they thought because I was sick I wouldn't have any use for my cloak. I didn't know nothin' about it until today. Then I looked for it and it was gone. So I begun askin' the other girls about it, and at last one of them said—she was a girl who had given notice and was readin' the want columns every day—she said there was a green cloak advertised found. So I went and got it. But I'd like to get hold of the girl that borrowed it. I'd make her take it and buy me a new one, or I'd have the law on her."

Ashton had listened to this speech with a show of somewhat greater interest. Evidently it occurred to him that an inquiry as to who the girl suspected of having taken it might be productive of results. She could easily be induced to tell all she knew about the other employees in the hotel. So much was clear. But when, instead of following up this lead, Doctor McAllister changed the subject abruptly, Ashton dropped back in his chair with a little gesture of impatience.

For myself, the doctor's course puzzled me profoundly. That all this examination was a mere pretense, was, of course, obvious to me. We knew all about Jane Perkins, infinitely more about her than she knew about herself. We knew she had worn the cloak; knew that she, or the woman, rather, who had for a while inhabited her body, had actually murdered old Morgan. And if the object of the pretense were to keep Ashton amused, to make him believe that it was leading him to a possible solution of the mystery, then it had signally failed. Ashton was bored and rather disgusted. But it was not like my chief to fail, and certainly there was no look of defeat about his face. He was accomplishing something, I felt sure, though I could not even guess what that something was.

His next question seemed to me to be getting somewhat nearer the point, although it was the very one that made Ashton drop back in his chair with that gesture of impatience.

"Are your parents living, Jane?"

"No, sir. Neither of them."

"Have you lived in this country long?"

"Five or six years, sir."

"You're from New Zealand, or Australia, aren't you? You're not English?"

That question made Ashton sit up at any rate, that and the girl's answer to it.

"Wellington, New Zealand, sir. But how did you know?"

The answer had come instantly, but the next moment, with eyes perplexed, and with a vague gesture of her hands across them, she said:

"It's queer. It seems as if I had dreamed of talking to you about that."

"You knew, didn't you, Jane, that this Morgan who was murdered was a New Zealander? Oh, New Zealand has produced some great men. You're young, and I suppose you don't remember, perhaps have never ever heard of Bully Franklin and Josiah Haines. Old Morgan knew about them, though, I'll wager." He stood for a minute in silence, like one who tastes, in reminiscence, the flavor of an old story.

Then he pulled himself together and began asking the girl a series of rapid and, to me, rather meaningless questions. They were chiefly about Will Harvey, her acquaintance with him, how long ago it had begun and, in a general way, to what length of intimacy it had gone. The girl answered all these questions freely enough and with no appearance of hesitation.

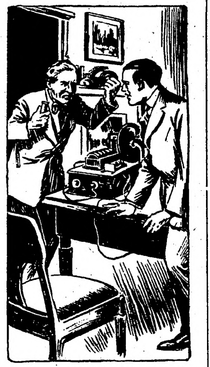
"You knew he lived at Oak Ridge, didn't you," the doctor asked finally, "only two or three blocks from the house where Morgan was murdered?"

"You don't think he had anythin' to do with the murder, do you?" she asked. And then she laughed a little. "He wouldn't do nothin' of that kind, sir. He's just a silly."

"I'm inclined to think, Perkins," the doctor commented, "that that's a good diagnosis. I don't believe Will Harvey, even if he showed us every thought within that rather empty head of his, would ever take us very close to old Henry Morgan with his maps and his mysteries."

He turned away there rather sharply, his back to all of us; tossed his head back once or twice, with a gesture very familiar to me as characteristic of his periods of intense thought. Then, turning back, he spoke to Ashton.

"Did we tell you," he asked, "that Phelps and I discovered one map which your detectives had evidently overlooked, an odd sort of map, from a geographer's point of view, drawn on a very large scale? And the queer thing about it was, that it showed neither latitude nor longitude. There was nothing about it to indicate what part of the world it represented. I brought it away with me this morning. I'll show it to you presently if you care to look at it. It's there on the table in that big manila envelope."



"Wilkins! And by Thunder I Believe I've Got Him."

"I beg your pardon, sir"—it was Wilkins who spoke—"I wonder if you could spare me now, sir. I'm supposed to be in the dining room at this hour."

The capacity of a trained servitor like Wilkins for eliminating himself, transforming himself into a mere piece of furniture, is something extraordinary. He had sat through the whole examination with a countenance of the same wooden imperturbability that he always wore on duty in the dining room.

The doctor unfastened the long flexible wires by which he was harnessed to the instrument.

"I hope we haven't kept you too long, Wilkins," he said. "It was very good of you to come."

"Not at all, sir. Don't mention it, sir. Sorry I have to leave now."

"Well," said the doctor slowly, "I think we're about through, anyway. Jane here has been ill, and we mustn't keep her too long. I don't think of anything else I want to question you about, Jane. Thank you very much for helping us."

He removed the little telephone that hung before the girl's lips, and slipped a dollar bill into her hand as he spoke. Then he turned to Wilkins, who had risen, still in his harness, and was scrutinizing, with amused curiosity, the portentously named instrument to which he had been attached.

The doctor, with a smile, was unstrapping the small recording instruments that were attached to his chest and wrists. "We're very much obliged," he said. "You've really helped us materially. His tone was low and confidential, not intended for the girl's ears. "I don't think she's any the worse for her examination, Wilkins," he concluded.

"Oh, no; likely not, sir. She looks a little pale, but I fancy that is no more than because the room is somewhat close."

"Is it?" asked the doctor.

"Well, it struck me so, sir. And I think, if you'll allow me, it might be well to have that ventilator cleaned. It is really very foul, sir. If you like, I'll speak to them in the office and have them send up a man tomorrow to do it."

He nodded, when he spoke of the ventilator, to a grated opening in the wall, and my eyes followed him. I didn't see anything wrong with it myself, but the man's eyes were evidently more practiced than mine.

The doctor feed him also, and liberally, and the next moment the head waiter and the chambermaid were out in the corridor and the door was closed behind them.

At the sound of that closing door, Ashton exploded, not with impatient anger, as I half expected he would, but with pure amusement. He laughed loud and long, and without the slightest effort to suppress his mirth. Doctor McAllister paid no attention, but let him enjoy his laugh undisturbed.

"Well," said the district attorney when he had got his breath, "I'm really very much obliged. After hearing so much about these psychological examinations, it's interesting to have been present at one."

The doctor nodded rather grimly. "It's not half as interesting as it will be in about five minutes," he said.

He was busy with the instruments on the table as he spoke. "Do you care to wait and see the results?" he added.

"Come—" said Ashton; "you don't really believe, do you, that you have found out anything, by some subtle, scientific process of yours, about that girl?"

"I know all about the girl already," said my chief. "But come, were you really taken in by the trick?"

"What trick?"

"Did you think, all the while, that it was the girl I was examining?"

A great light suddenly burst upon me, but Ashton was not so quick. His face went perfectly blank.

"Did I think it was the girl you were examining! What else could you have been doing? Who else was there to examine?"

"Wilkins!" said the doctor with a blow of his fist upon the table. "Wilkins! And, by thunder, I believe I have got him."

CHAPTER VIII

"Wilkins!" repeated Ashton. "What sort of farce is this?"

"If it turns out to be a farce," said the doctor, "it will be of your making. If I were clothed in your authority and know only what I know at this moment, I would go to that telephone and call in some trusty man to watch him; and if my guess survives the test to which I am about to put it, I should, within the next half hour, order his arrest."

He turned away too quickly to see the shrug of tolerant contempt which was all the answer Ashton vouchsafed to this suggestion. He unscrewed the megaphone which had been attached to the instrument to which Wilkins had been harnessed, and attached to it a pair of ear tubes to listen through, a glass tube which looked like a thermometer and another tube which terminated in a glass bulb, half full of a red liquid. He put the listening tubes to his ears and started the machine.

"Give Ashton a cigar, and don't let him talk," was his injunction to me.

For nearly a quarter of an hour after that there was silence in the room; but at last he stopped the cylinder which was revolving in the instrument, took the tubes from his ears and laid them on the table. Then he turned to us.

"I was right, Ashton," he said. "I know you want an explanation, and I'm going to give it; but if Wilkins is to be at large during the time it will take me to tell the story, I want the responsibility to be upon you, and not upon me. If I were in your place, I should order his arrest."

Rebuke to Emperor by Master of Music

At a concert in St. Petersburg, before a brilliant assemblage which included the czar and many members of his court, Franz Liszt was conducting a symphony. During the course of the music the czar began to converse in audible tones with one of his fair neighbors. In the very midst of the movement Liszt gave with his baton a signal for the music to cease, and the players stopped short.

The abrupt silence filled the audience with surprise, and the czar at once sent an equerry to ask for an explanation. Whereupon Liszt sent back word:

"When the czar speaks, all the rest must be silent."

As this was a court regulation, the czar had to suffer the rebuke of a foreign musician administered under the guise of obedience to court etiquette. Hanz von Bulow, in relating his father-in-law's unprecedented act of courage, says George S. Hellman, who tells the story in "Lanes of Memory," said that he would have given a year of his life to have had such an opportunity to teach an emperor that art must be respected.

Where Science Fails

MINNESOTA BRIEFS

Hastings—Mrs. Emma Chamberlain of Hastings was elected president of the third district Sunday School Association at its annual meeting here.

Duluth—Total shipments of iron ore from the Duluth-Superior harbor will show a slight decrease over the shipments of 1926, according to estimates made by mining officials here.

Worthington — Representatives of Brethren churches in Minnesota, South Dakota and Iowa concluded a district conference at the Elk church near here.

Minneapolis—Attempt to settle the theater strike failed when the striking employes and the officials of the Northwest Motion Picture Theater Owners' association came to no agreement.

St. James—Miss Ruth Thompson, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. A. Thompson, who was Minnesota winner in the state typing contest, left for New York city to take part in the national contest.

Bagley—On the farm of B. A. Anderson in Eddy township of Clearwater county, a Duluth mining company is drilling for iron following finding specimens while a well was being sunk.

Minneapolis—Federal Judge Joseph W. Molyneaux ordered the northwest prohibition unit to show cause why it should not remove a temporary padlock on a malt show raided by dry agents.

St. Peter—Removal of the criminal ward from the state hospital for the insane at St. Peter to Stillwater will be recommended to the legislature by the state board of control, members announced.

St. Peter—After accompanying the body of his mother here for burial, Major Russell Davis, for several years on duty with the Marines in Haiti, left here for Washington. Mrs. Davis, wife of former Congressman C. R. Davis, died in Haiti September 22, while visiting her son.

Duluth—The Virginia & Rainy Lake Company, with lumber manufacturing plants at Virginia, will have 16 camps in the woods this winter getting out timber. Last year it operated 14 camps, while during the coming winter there will be 2,300 men employed at the 16 camps.

St. Paul—The fire loss in Minnesota last year was $1,500,000 less than in 1925, officials of the state fire marshal's office reported. The fire loss throughout the state this year will be the lowest on record if the remaining months follow the trend thus far, fire marshals said.

St. Paul—Increases totalling $3,577,593 in the assessment valuation of 43 Minnesota iron ore properties, ordered by the state tax commission were protested by property owners at a hearing which started before the commission.

St. Paul—More than 60 officers of 15 of the 24 Elks' lodges throughout the state met at the Elks' club to formulate plans for work of the Minnesota State Elks' association for the coming year. One of the principal plans discussed was the adoption of the Junior Elks' work.

St. Paul—The debate schedule of the Minnesota Intercollegiate Debate conference was announced by officers of the organization. The conference is made up of five Minnesota colleges: Gustavus Adolphus at St. Peter, St. Olaf at Northfield, Macalaster at St. Paul, St. Thomas at St. Paul and Hamline University, at St. Paul.

Rochester—Forty-five years ago a fire was built in boilers of the state hospital here, and since then a bed of coals has been kept alive continuously. The long-time record has been established because of heat requirements at the hospital. The fire will be maintained for an indefinite period, according to engineers.

Cambridge — The Mora baseball team won the Minnesota Amateur baseball championship defeating St. James by a score of 1 to 0 in a well played 10 inning struggle. The game was played on the local field and was the finals of the state tournament at Lexington park.

Minneapolis—More than 4,000 delegates attended the annual convention of the American Hospital Association at the Auditorium. Every new scientific invention designed to make life more comfortable for the sick person was on display when a million dollar exhibit of hospital supplies and equipment opened in connection with the twenty-ninth annual convention.

St. Paul—Purchase of 2,100 acres of land as an addition to Itaska state park, proposed by the state department of conservation, was approved by the "Big Three." Two tracts will be purchased in accordance with the orders of the 1919 legislature providing for extension of the west border of the park for two miles over a boundary line of seven miles in length

Tomato Is Fruit

Is a tomato a fruit or a vegetable? Frequently this question has been raised in the produce markets. For Canada, at least, the matter has been officially decided by G. E. McIntosh, Dominion fruit commissioner, and in the trade the tomato will be known as a fruit. The government, in accordance with a recommendation sent on by the fruit branch, passed an order in council on classifications, which contained the tomato, which was included in the list of fruits.

Hair Getting Thin?

Maybe You Don't Shampoo It Right

If your hair is falling out and getting thin in spots it's time to give a little thought to the way you shampoo. Many men make the mistake of using ordinary soap for shampooing. This is wrong, because the free alkali in ordinary soap makes the hair dry and brittle and absorbs the natural oil from the scalp. Thousands of men attribute their thick, strong hair to the regular use of Marcelle Lemon Shampoo. This amazing preparation cleans the hair perfectly without making the hair dry and brittle. Also it acts as a gentle stimulant to the scalp, thus promoting a healthy, natural hair growth. Use Marcelle Lemon Shampoo for a month and note the marked improvement in the appearance of your hair.

Thanksgiving Day in New England
In Colonial times it was a day of homecoming giving thanks, turkey and pumpkin pie—It was the Puritan Christmas, the one day of merry-making and cheer.

Grandmother had no farther to go than the cellar or the turkey pen to obtain the material for her Thanksgiving spread.

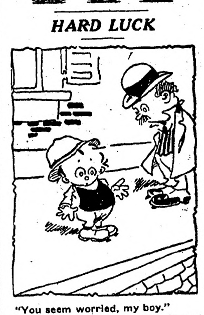
But what about these luckless wights who had no ancestral farmhouse to which they might repair on Thanksgiving day? Were they left desolate? Not at all. The innkeeper to the rescue. It seems that the old inns along the rock-bound coasts fairly rivaled the homesteads in making merry on Thanksgiving. Hezekiah Butterworth gives us a picture of that hospitable ordinary, the Inn of the Good Woman, that stood in the east end of Boston in the early part of the Eighteenth century.

The sign of the inn was a picture of a woman without a head, the suggestion being that the head is a dispensable part of a truly good woman, and that silence and service became the landlady. It is said that the device set many a woman's tongue to wagging, that the sign became the topic during the dinner hour, and that it is probable the discussions led to the first woman's rights opinions formed in old Boston town. In describing the life at the Inn of the Good Woman, the author doubtless shows what was being enacted in many another old inn on Thanksgiving day. He says:

"The Inn of the Good Woman was famous for its humor and lively tales, and after-dinner stories on Thanksgiving days were a feature of the period of political expectancy. Thanksgiving was the Puritan Christmas, in Colonial times, the one day of merry-making and good cheer." After the morning sermon and the noon feast Thanksgiving afternoon and evening were seasons of social enjoyment, given over to musician, riddler and story-teller. The wayfarer, the bachelor, the traveler, the immigrant, all who were without an established home, found happiness in front of the great fires of the inn and tasted the joys of "the jug, the beef, the turkey, the brown bread, the succotash, the pumpkin cake, the apple dumplings." The Inn of the Good Woman had an especially American cuisine on Thanksgiving, says the author. "There the peppery sausages were browned for all in the morning; the apple dumplings with potato crusts and pandowdy were served as a dessert at noon, and the hot gingerbread with like liberality at the evening meal. There the best, the cleverest, the most thrilling of all the marvelous stories were told."

If one were a wayfarer, a bachelor, a traveler or an immigrant, and were permitted to take the trail of the yesterdays, would not one seek to join the company at the Inn of the Good Woman this Thanksgiving day? Would one not feast upon the food of reason and the flow of soul, and in so doing is there one who would refuse a second helping of that pumpkin "cake" or pumpkin pie which the hostess offered? No; more likely one would, as one crunched the brown crusts and yellow meat, echo in silence the children's "Hurrah for the pumpkin pie!"—Kansas City Times.

HARD LUCK



"You seem worried, my boy."

"I am, mister; you see I've been to three newsboys' dinners an' I'm 'fraid I can't git to the two others."

Early Proclamations

History records that in 1763 Halifax proclaimed a day of Thanksgiving to mark the peace that made Canada a British possession. Thirty-two years later, in 1795, Washington, first President of the United States, issued the first national Thanksgiving proclamation of that country. The day was more or less generally observed by a number of the States in succeeding years, and since President Lincoln's call for its observation in 1864, has grown in significance, and has attained standing as a national holiday in the Republic.

BRINGING HOME THE TURKEY

When father brought the turkey
home—
You must remember that?
The thrills—the wild excitement, too—
From mother down to cat!
No circus day in all Youth's years,
No toy in Santa's pack,
Outrivaled Dad when he came home—
A gobbler on his back!

When father brought the turkey
home—
I see him smiling now,
Though neighbors, knowing our estate,
Looked on and wondered how.
We children did not understand,
But, since, I've heard Dad say:
"Your mother joyed in sacrifice
To make Thanksgiving day!"

When father brought the turkey
home—
Perplexities arose;
Where would we keep it? Mother said:
"The cellar, I suppose."
We made a prisoner of our prey,

Put stones against the door.
Then spent a sleepless night in fear
We'd see him nevermore!

When father brought the turkey
home—
Dear mother used to say:
"I need the wings to dust the hearth
And brush the crumbs away."
All other feathers would be ours,
For Indians abhor
To go unfeathered down the trail
When councilling for war!
—William Herschell, in the Indianapolis News.

Not Easy to Trace Ancestry of Turkey

There are some who claim that the turkey which gets such a prominent place at Thanksgiving time, came from Mexico. Both the Mexican wild bird and our barnyard turkey have a creamy white on the tips of the tail feathers and on the feathers overlying the base of the tail. The wild turkey of the East is a decided chestnut brown. Very often a domesticated bird will appear very like its Mexican granddad, several times removed, except for a greater development of the fatty lobes of head and neck.

There are others who tell us that when the Spaniards made their conquest of Mexico they found at Montezuma a fine zoological garden. In it were nearly all the native birds and animals, with many gathered from afar. Strutting about were the ancestors of our domestic turkey. The zoo birds were domesticated. In the outlying country there were many wild brothers and sisters of these birds. Before the first quarter of a century was over some of the domestic birds had been transplanted to the West Indies and the Spanish main, where they were kept by colonists. By 1540 the turkey had made its way to England, and 30 years later was in high favor as the Christmas dish of the English farmer.

Harvest Home Feasts Old English Custom

The following lines were often sung in rural England at the celebration of Harvest Home:

Harvest-home, harvest-home,
We have ploughed, we have sowed,
We have reaped, we have mowed,
We have brought home every load,
Hip, hip, hip, harvest-home!

Nowadays the last day of "carrying the corn" is not marked by such hearty rejoicing and feasting as formerly. Most of the old harvest customs have been allowed to drop. In many parts of England, Harvest Home was the name given to the festival celebrated in honor of the corn-gathering. In Scotland the term was Kirn. Kirn-supper was the name given to the meal, which was the principal item in the rejoicings. The word probably comes from "churn," as a churn of cream was often part of the material entertainment. In the north of England the feast was called the Mell supper. Probably this term comes from the French melee (a scramble, mixture, or mingling).

Chopping Block (to Ax)—I don't see any turkeys following us around these days!

NIGHT AND THE DAWNING

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright by W. G. Chapman.)

"I DON'T know what to do with myself evenings," sighed Ronald Cray, leaning out of the back window of his bachelor apartment and surveying the gloomy flats around him.

Two months before he had been summoned home from New Mexico, where his power dam had made him famous, to take charge of the engineering department of his company at headquarters. His salary was ample, he had wealth, he was only twenty-five; yet he had managed to make no acquaintances in the big city.

A free life in the West had made him different from the average city-bred young man; he thought the metropolis stiff and its people devoid of interest.

Suddenly, as he leaned out, surveying the huge buildings and speculating how many thousand lives ran on in them, a light sprang into being in the building opposite, on the fifth floor, on a level with his. Behind a drawn shade he saw the silhouette of a man.

He was stooping over a table and, as Cray watched, he saw the shadow of a woman behind him. Suddenly her hand plunged downward. The elongated object in it looked like a poniard. It struck the man in the side of the neck and he rolled over.

The woman stood looking at him for a moment; then, with a gesture of triumph, she flung the poniard out of the window, raising the shade a little. Cray heard a metallic tinkle in the court below. Then followed darkness.

He leaned out, astounded at what he had seen and hardly believing it real. How long he waited he did not know. Suddenly his bell rang.

He went out into the passage and saw, standing outside the door, one of the most beautiful women whom he had ever met. She was twenty-three or four. Her eyes gleamed with feverish intensity, her hair was disheveled and her hands were red.

"Save me! Hide me! Help me!" she pleaded.

Cray did not hesitate an instant. He pulled her through the doorway and led her to the bathroom. He filled the basin and washed her hands, drying them on a towel afterward. Then he took her into his spare room.

"You're quite safe here," he said in a low voice. "Nobody saw you come in. You can stay as long as you want to."

She crouched in a corner, glaring at him like a hunted beast. He hesitated, then he closed and bolted the window and withdrew, leaving the door open.

For half an hour he waited, fearing that he would hear the bolt snap, that she would try to plunge down into the court below. But hardly a sound came from the room. When at last he returned, she was lying on the floor asleep.

He placed her on the couch and she did not awaken. Her sleep was of profound exhaustion. All night Cray sat up, waiting. Sometimes he stole in to look at her, but she never stirred. It was not till the sun was well up that he heard her moving.

She came forward unsteadily and looked in at him as he sat by the window.

"Where am I?" she cried. "Who are you?"

Cray rose and took her by the hands. "I am a friend," he answered. "You are safe here—safe to come or to go."

She burst into hysterical sobbing. When at last he had quieted her the girl told Cray her story.

She had met a man in her home in Virginia, three months before. He had asked her to be his wife. Her parents mistrusted him; she followed him stealthily, to learn too late that all that had been said about him was true. He was a gambler, a swindler. She remembered those three months with loathing. Her horror of him had grown. He had deceived her with a mock ceremony, lied to her—at last she had learned that he had a wife already.

She had written home, but her letters were returned unanswered. She had nowhere to turn, she was ignorant of any trade, and the man held her by his lying promises. He had almost got his divorce, he said; he loved her; for her sake he would reform, if only she would trust him.

She had waited for him the evening before; then there was a dreadful blank in her mind, and she had recovered to find herself standing over the body. And she had fled wildly for shelter.

Cray patted her hands. "You stay with me until the trouble blows over," he said. "I want a housekeeper. You will be quite safe here. I shall let it be known that you answered an advertisement. When all is ready I will help you to a new life. You trust me?"

She looked at him helplessly. "I am so ignorant," she wept. "I must trust you. I have nobody else."

"You will not regret it," said Cray. And he knew the girl was safe there. Nobody came to call at his little apartment.

The murder occupied two columns of his morning paper, but the only clew was that afforded by a negro janitor, who had seen a woman ascending the steps a few minutes before the tragedy. And he stated that her hair was fair. The unknown woman's was ebony dark. Cray felt safe.

The poniard was found, but gave no clew. And gradually the interest waned. Nobody knew the murdered man, who had very good reasons for disguising his identity.

As the days passed Helen Ware came to trust Cray absolutely. She cooked for him, mended his clothes, resolutely refused to take the money that he pressed upon her. "I can never forget what I owe you," she would say. But sometimes there would be spells of weeping. "I did not mean to kill him," the girl would moan. "I do not remember anything, except sitting at home waiting for him with bitterness of heart; then I heard him come in and went to him—and I was standing over him with the dagger in my hands."

"You don't recall the dagger?"

"Yes. It was a curio of his; some friend from a savage country had given it to him. I must have snatched it from the wall and stabbed him."

As the weeks turned into months, Cray found himself torn between two impulses. He wanted to let the girl go to some scene where she would be able to take up her life anew. And yet—he knew that he loved her. Her helplessness, her charm, the bond between them had created an intimacy that was infinitely sweet. He had been offered a new position in the West. One night he took his courage in his hands and asked her to be his wife and go with him where all memory of the past could be forgotten.

He knew by her looks that she loved him. But she would not.

"It is your pity for me, Ronald, not love," she said, sighing. "I love you, but I can never be your wife so long as this curse of blood lies on me."

"You acted rightly," he cried hotly. "No jury would have convicted you. Helen, dearest, forgot it and come with me."

"I cannot," she answered sadly. "I must leave you, and you must forget."

But on the next day something happened which drove all thoughts of parting from their heads. The wife of the murdered man was arrested charged with the crime.

It was known that she had been in the city that day. She had threatened him; the negro janitor identified her as the woman he had seen near the apartment house. And Ronald and Helen watched the unfolding of the grim trial with dismay.

On the evening before the last day Helen spoke to Ronald about what lay uppermost in her mind.

"I cannot let that woman be convicted," she said. "I must go down to the court and offer my confession."

Ronald could not dissuade her. He knew that it was the only possible thing.

And all day they sat in the dreary courtroom listening to the intolerably long summing up. The jury had at last retired. Ronald had persuaded Helen not to speak unless the verdict was "guilty."

It was hours before the jury returned. A murmur spread through the courtroom. The face of the foreman was deadly white. He trembled and looked away from the prisoner's straining eyes. There could be no doubt what the verdict was.

Suddenly Helen sprang to her feet. Ronald rose and kept his arm about her. She faced the prisoner and stretched out her hand.

But before a word could leave her lips the woman in the dock uttered a shriek and recoiled, clutching at the air.

"Yes, I am guilty," she cried. "He lied to me, deceived me. I learned that he was supporting another woman, who was passing as his wife. I dogged him to his home. I entered after him. I saw him in the hallway, and over his head a dagger hung. It seemed placed there for me. I struck him—and then the other woman came out—and she stands there!"

And she collapsed unconscious upon the floor.

Helen fell into Ronald's arms.

"It is true! It is true!" she cried. "I remember everything!"

The verdict of "manslaughter" was further eased by a mercifully light sentence, and, with the obstacle to their marriage removed, Ronald and Helen went West, where they started upon their new life together.

Cases of Friendship Between Sexes Rare

Platonic friendships between women and men are rare and short-lived, says Thyra Samter Winslow in an article in Liberty. "Biologically, I think we will all agree that a fifty-fifty deal between the sexes is impossible," she writes. "Platonic friendship is a beautiful thing, but I have seen few cases of it in real life. Either it ripens into something deeper—and far more interesting, as a usual thing—or it drifts into an acquaintanceship that becomes pretty much of a bore. Real friendship without thought of warmer affection is rare.

"Friendships between men and women," the writer continues, "are among the most beautiful of human relations, but in nearly all the cases that have come under my observation it has been the man who has been the cause of ending them. Either he insisted on trying to turn friendship into a more amorous relationship, or his love affair—or affairs—with some other women made him neglect his friendships almost entirely.

"As long as biology exists in its present state—and there is no reason to suppose it will change—life will be more or less of a game and the war of the sexes will exist in various forms."

IS A HEALTHIER STRONGER GIRL

Because She Took Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

The fertile valleys of Oregon help to supply the tables of America. This is possible through the magic of the humble tin can.

In one of the canning establishments, Julia Schmidt was employed. It was complicated work because she did sealing and other parts of the work. It was strenuous work and she was not a strong girl. Often she forced herself to work when she was hardly able to sit at her machine. At times she would have to stay at home for she was so weak she could hardly walk. For five years she was in this weakened condition.

She tried various medicines. At last, a friend of hers spoke of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and she gave it a trial.

"Everyone says I am a healthier and stronger girl," she writes. "I am recommending the Vegetable Compound to all my friends who tell me how they suffer and I am willing to answer letters from women asking about it." Julia Schmidt's address is 113 Willow St., Silverton, Oregon.

Girls who work in factories know just how Miss Schmidt felt. Perhaps they, too, will find better health by taking the Vegetable Compound.

Salts Fine for Aching Kidneys

When Back Hurts Flush Your Kidneys as You Clean Your Bowels

Most folks forget that the kidneys, like the bowels, sometimes get sluggish and clogged and need a flushing occasionally, else we have backache and dull misery in the kidney region, severe headaches, rheumatic twinges, torpid liver, acid stomach, sleeplessness and all sorts of bladder disorders.

You simply must keep your kidneys active and clean and the moment you feel an ache or pain in the kidney region begin drinking lots of water. Also get about four ounces of Jad Salts from any good drug store here, take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast for a few days and your kidneys will then act fine. This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and is intended to flush clogged kidneys and help stimulate them to activity. It also helps neutralize the acids in the urine so they no longer irritate, thus helping to relieve bladder disorders.

Jad Salts is inexpensive; makes a delightful effervescent lithia water drink which everybody should take now and then to help keep their kidneys clean.

A well-known local druggist says he sells lots of Jad Salts to folks who believe in trying to correct kidney trouble while it is only trouble.

Takes Boy Three Days to Land Big Fish

Nelson, B. C.—The endurance fishing championship of these parts is claimed by Don Bush, fifteen, who arrived here with an 18-pound salmon and a story that it took him three days to land the fish after sinking a fly hook.

The boy was using a light line which did not permit him to adopt vigorous measures after the salmon retreated under a rock. On the third day he approached the problem with a rowboat and landed the salmon.

PEGRETS WILD RIDE IN STOLEN MACHINE

It Gets Young Paul Revere Into Trouble.

Philadelphia.—The midnight equestrian jaunt of Paul Revere had nothing on the late evening automobile dash up the parkway of his fifteen-year-old namesake, Paul Revere Rule.

Paul, a clear-cut, well-tailored blond boy, frankly admitted to Presiding Judge Leopold C. Glass in the Juvenile court that the urge to ride is in his blood despite the fact that he is not a descendant of the man who made the famous Concord to Lexington record.

"I knew the automobile was stolen," he said, "but that fact didn't impress me as much as the idea of just taking a ride."

According to Richardson and Himple, policemen, the motor car, driven by nineteen-year-old William Archer, since held in $1,000 bail for court, was going from 40 to 50 miles an hour.

Later the car was identified by J. Dowdy of Melrose Park as his.

"I had nothing to do with stealing the car," Rule said. "I just wanted to ride. I couldn't resist Bill's invitation. It was the first ride of the sort I have ever had, and it will be the last if you will give me another chance."

Cut Parachute Ropes in Air to Save Two

Hasbrouck Heights, N. J.—The quick jerk of a knife blade that cut a 100-foot rope holding two parachutes together 3,000 feet in the air, saved the lives of Diavalo Krant and J. C. Efferson.

The two aerial acrobats had ascended 3,000 feet in an airplane. At that height before more than 2,000 persons the two men jumped, one from each side of the wing.

The parachutes opened simultaneously and the gasping crowd watched eagerly while the acrobats pulled their "chutes" together on the rope joining them and prepared to change parachutes, a stunt never before performed. They had been dropping only a few seconds when the parachutes came together.

To persons on the ground it seemed likely that Efferson and Krant would collide and that their parachutes would foul each other, causing a drop and almost certain death.

But at that moment Krant cut the rope and the two "chutes" separated. Krant was first to land safely on the flying field.

Chipmunk Kills Snake, Then Dies of Poison

Bellefonte, Pa.—A chipmunk weighing scarcely half a pound thwarted the plans of foresters near here to witness a battle royal between a rattler and a blacksnake.

Capturing a rattlesnake four and a half feet long the foresters decided to hold it until a blacksnake—traditional enemy of the rattler—could be found.

Unable to locate a blacksnake, the foresters placed the chipmunk in the rattler's den to provide the reptile with a meal. The chipmunk had other plans and, taking the aggressive, literally bit the snake in two.

The chipmunk was bitten during the struggle and died of the poison from the rattler's fangs, but not until it had lived to see its enemy die.

Lasso Breaks Neck of Lad Playing Cowboy

New York.—A game of "cowboy," in which six-year-old Raymond Riordan of Shrewsbury, N. J., was lassoed and dragged some distance, resulted in the death of the child in the Long Branch hospital from a broken neck.

Joseph Billings, a seventeen-year-old lad, whose mental growth has not kept pace with his unusual physical development, according to the police, is being sought as the wielder of the rope.

Raymond became ill after the "cowboy" game. The child refused to tell how he was injured until just before paralysis set in, although a rope burn on his neck caused the physician to suspect he had been hurt while at play.

EASY LESSONS IN AUCTION BRIDGE

Original No Trump Bids

IN CONSIDERING a no trump bid there are a few restrictions which should be mentioned:

Frequently a hand will meet all of the requirements of a no trump bid and also contain a five-card suit with ample support for a bid of that suit. Either a no trump or a suit bid may be made; which shall it be?

All of the rules of Auction have been determined from the mathematical law of averages by trying a large number of experiments, and it has been found that a good five-card suit bid is much safer than a no trump, especially when the hand contains a worthless doubleton. Therefore, if all bids had equal game-going possibilities the suit always would be chosen, but because of the various counts the no trump has the greatest game-going possibility. It requires but three odd tricks to make game in no trump while four odd are necessary in a major suit and five odd in a minor.

Taking these differences into consideration it has been found that most hands of the above-mentioned type will produce game oftener at no trump if the long suit is a minor, but that the chances for game are better with the suit as trump if that suit is a major. Therefore, we obtain the simple rule that when holding a hand from which a bid of a suit or of no trump may be made, to bid the suit if it is a major but to bid no trump if the strong suit is a minor.

Another matter of importance in a no trump declaration is the distribution of the cards in the various suits. The most favorable distributions for a no trump bid are 4-3-3-3, 4-4-3-2 and 5-3-3-2; while 5-4-2-2, 5-4-3-1, 5-5-2-1 and 5-4-4-0 are increasingly more dangerous. In other words, two doubletons are very undesirable unless both are protected suits; a singleton is decidedly objectionable; and being void of a suit prohibits a no trump bid.

The reasons for this are easy to see. If the bidder is very short of a suit some one at the table is probably very long in that suit, and if the opponents open it and dummy does not have it stopped the opponents are quite sure to take five or six tricks in it before the declarer can get the lead.

It is not wise to abandon a good no trump because of holding a singleton Ace or King, since even if that suit is led, the declarer could expect to stop it by taking the first trick. However, if the hand has a worthless singleton much more heed should be given to it. A major worthless singleton is not nearly so dangerous as a minor, because if second hand holds a powerful major suit he is quite sure to bid it while he would invariably pass when holding an equally strong minor suit.

A hand which contains two suits of at least five cards, either of which is strong enough for an original bid, is called a "two-suiter" and is considered the strongest possible hand at Auction when played with that suit for trump which best fits the partner's hand. A no trump should not be bid when holding a two-suiter.

We find a slight difference between an original bid by third hand and one by dealer or second hand because third hand's partner, by passing, has informed him that he does not hold four sure tricks. Therefore, third hand should have 2½ quick tricks in order to make an original bid of one.

When we reach fourth hand this same condition exists, but there is another reason why fourth hand should have added strength before making an original bid. After three players have passed, unless fourth hand has an especially strong holding the indications are that the cards are very evenly divided, and that fourth hand could not make game, which should be the goal aimed at by every bid. If fourth hand passes, the hand is not played, but if he bids, it opens up a new round of bidding and the opponents may start a secondary bid upon which they may be able to help each other sufficiently to go game. Therefore, unless fourth hand has at least one quick trick more than the requirements for an original bid by dealer or second hand, he should pass and throw down the hand.

Ear of Slain Bull Prize for Matador

It will not be long, according to a recent report, before bullfighting is ousted as the national sport of Spain. When bullfighting goes, it will take with it the custom of rewarding the successful matador with the ear of the bull that he kills.

To the successful contestant in the "corrida" the ear of the bull means as much as the silver cup to a winning tennis player or as the little gold football to the college halfback. It is the bullfighter's "medal of honor." When an unusually skillful matador has disposed of a bull the populace at a bullfight stands up and shouts, "La oreja! La oreja!" ("The ear! The ear!")

This means that the crowd wants the president of the "corrida" to award to the fortunate matador, as an especial mark of distinction, one of the ears of the bull. The ear is cut off and presented on a platter.

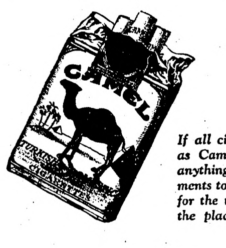
The greatest endorsement ever given to a cigarette is revealed by the fact that Government figures show that more Camels are being smoked today than ever before. An endorsement by the many—not the few.



If all cigarettes were as good as Camel you wouldn't hear anything about special treatments to make cigarettes good for the throat. Nothing takes the place of choice tobaccos.

Holt has a new business place and that is a cream station. Usually the people of the town as well as the community give a new businessman the glad hand and wish him luck, if it is believed his business is such that he can render the people a needed service and at the same time conduct a business that the town and community can profit by it, as well as himself Is there a sound thinking man in our community that believes a cream station is needed in Holt? Far from it, and Monday being his opening day I am assured that our community have many broadminded men as I understand the man in charge of the cream station dind't get one can of cream.

The creamery in Holt opened its doors for business 20 years ago, prior to that time they had cream stations. At the beginning all cooperative creameries had to go into debt and no one knows more about the ups and downs this creamery has gone thru than the undersigned. It took grit and faithfulness on the part of the shareholders, board of directors, and the operator during the trying days when this creamery was in its infancy.

Today our creamery is in a fine condition. We are still operating in the same old building, yet it has been improved considerably, we have the best of good equipment, all paid for and on top of that a surplus of between $8,000.00 and $10,000.00. Those good old souls that bought shares and made this institution possible can truthfully say that the book value of their shares has increased from $25.00 to $200.00.

We are in position to pay the highest price for butterfat that any of the best creameries in the northwest. Your butter is marketed under your own brand, through the Land O' Lakes organization.

It is most unfortunate that our cream station buyer should be one of our local boys. His father, Ole Reierson, as well as his Uncle, Reier Reierson, are among the pioneers in this country and dug to the depth of their pockets in order to buy shares at the time this creamery was started. R. Reierson was not a farmer yet he bought three shares to help get the creamery going. Can you imagine what these two men would have said if someone had told them at the time they bought shares in this creamery that your son and nephew is goitg to be the first one to try and tear asunder your creamery. It is hard to believe what his motives are, yet time will tell. Judging from what our patrons think of Obert Reierson and his cream station, I do not think he will get to first base. Why should he? Every farmer is aware of what a middleman is and if there ever was an unnecessary one the man handling cream thru a cream station is it. Can you imagine why you should bring in your cream to the station and let the stationman take a crack at your cream check. let your cream set around his place for awhile and then he hauls it to the depot and ships it to where it is churned into butter. Why not bring it to the creamery? If you absolutely do not want to do that, then let me hope you are wise enough to ship direct rather than to make the local stationman a donation, which is what you do. No one pays his salary but the farmer that sells his cream to him.

Much more could be said on this subject yet at this time I shall refrain from discussing the matter any further. I feel certain that the farmers of Holt are to far versed on the benefits of their own creamery and that the outcome of the cream station is allready pictured on the wall

The company this man is buying for didn't put forth any efforts to have the station put in and they surely are not willing to operate where no profit is forth coming so it is plain to see what should be done to eliminate it. Just this: Do not patronize him.

RESOLUTION

Adopted by the Holt Commercial Club Nov. 1, 1927.

WHEREAS: Some of the activities of our "Commercial Club" should be to encourage any undertaking or movement that we consider would be of value to our community. We should encourage further new settlers and business establishments providing, however, that such a business would be of benefit to the town and community.

WHEREAS: A cream station opened its doors for business October 31, 1627. It is only just and fair to our people that we let them know our standing in this matter.

BE IT RESOLVED: that the Commercial Club of Holt duly assembled feel that a cream station is uncalled for since we have one of the best Co-operative Creameries in the northwest.

It is further resolved that the farmers should be discouraged from selling their cream through the cream station; inasmuch, as statistics show that the farmer receives less per pound for his butterfat than if he sells his cream to his own Co-operative Creamery.

Meanwhile

The prolific Wells (the adjective renders it unnecessary to give his initials) is out with another novel. It is called "Meanwhile," and an inkling of its message, or at any rate an explanation of its title, can be gathered from the following extracts:

"What is life for you is meanwhile for most of us," says Sempack, the forward-looking theorist.

"Have I been living?" inquires another character, "or have I just been meanwhiling away my life?"

That is a question a good many of us might profitably put to ourselves.

—14—

"I'll take the responsibility," said Ashton. "Until I know some reason that isn't absolutely farcical for arresting a man, I won't arrest him. At the same time I shall be glad to hear this story of yours."

The doctor nodded. "Well," he said, "since you're in no hurry, I think I'll take time to light a cigar myself."

He had it drawing comfortably and had got himself comfortably ensconced in a big easy chair, his feet stretched out in front of him upon a tabouret, before he began to talk.

"Do you remember," he asked, "what we chatted about on our drive to St. Martin's hospital the other night?"

"If my memory serves me correctly," said Ashton, "we didn't talk about the murder at all. You spent most of the time, unless I am mistaken, telling pirate stories."

The doctor nodded. "Do you remember my telling you how Bully Franklin came to his end? He was killed by one of his crew as the result of jealousy and a love affair. Now that murder had some rather interesting consequences—"

"What is this," Ashton interrupted, "a parable? Am I supposed to draw some subtle, devious psychological connection between that murder and this one that we're concerned with?"

"Not at all," said the doctor. "I know you much too well. The connection between that murder and this is literal. It's about the most direct connection that could possibly exist between two events separated by half a world and nearly two decades of time. The second murder was the logical consequence of the first; the second act of the tragedy. I don't say the last act, because I suspect there's another still to come."

"You've actually traced a connection?" Ashton asked with a gasp.

"Let me tell my story right-end-to," said the doctor. "You'll see the connection plainly enough when I come to it. I told you, I think, that Franklin's crew became completely disorganized after his death, and that most of the members of it were apprehended and paid the penalty of their crimes. There were two, however, who escaped. One of them was his first mate, Josiah Haines. The other man was Franklin's murderer. He disappeared, too, at least he was never brought to justice. The authorities, for some reason, didn't seem to regard his capture as especially important, for no price was ever put upon his head. That man's name was Henry Morgan."

I had seen what was coming, but it was clear that Ashton had not. His eyes opened wide, his jaw dropped slack, the cigar he held fell from his nerveless fingers.

"Henry Morgan!" he repeated. "The same man?"

"Undoubtedly the same. He fled almost immediately after committing the murder, but not until he had gone through his chief's pockets, and possibly rifled his stateroom besides. At any rate, he got away with what ready cash Franklin had upon him—and he was famous, I remember, for carrying a good deal—and also some papers. The money he got was utterly insignificant compared to the potential value of another thing he took with him. That other thing was the map, of which I spoke just now."

He stretched out his arms, rose from his chair and took a turn or two about the room.

"I ought to amend that last remark," he continued. "I don't know myself how great the potential value of that map may be. Its importance in the eyes of Josiah Haines was undoubtedly very great, and Haines was in a position to know, if anyone was. Franklin always had a reputation for possessing a good business head. Many as were the robberies he committed, numerous as were the unfortunate people whom he murdered outright, he gained more by fraud than by violence. He cheated vastly more men than he killed. I have little doubt that he laid up a really considerable fortune. But whatever it amounted to, he hid it in that particularly forsaken corner of the world which is indicated by a cross upon that map. As I said, Morgan got the map and fled to America with it."

"It seems to me," Ashton interjected, "that he would have done better to have gone straight to this forsaken island and collected the treasure first. But then, so far as that goes, how do you know he didn't?"

"Because he couldn't," said the doctor. "Franklin had outwitted him after all. He had to make a map, for the location of the treasure was too complex to trust to memory. But he made the map perfectly worthless to anyone who was a stranger to his secret, by omitting latitude and longitude from it. There was nothing about it to inform its possessor where, in the whole South Pacific, that island was located; and the South Pacific is a big place. So Morgan did what was, perhaps, the most sensible thing he could have done; he hid himself in the securest place he could find and began making a collection of maps."

Ashton shook his head in perplexity.

"Well," he said, "if applied psychology will enable you to make discoveries like that, I apologize to it most humbly."

"That wasn't psychology at all," said the doctor; "it was plain logic. I found torn up scraps of maps in his waste-paper basket, making it perfectly evident that he had destroyed them after they had served, or had failed to serve some purpose of his. That put him at once out of the class of the mere geographer. I knew he must have some standard he tested these maps by; knew that he must keep it in some easily accessible place. Finding it, after I had discovered a principle like that to guide me, was comparatively easy business."

"Go on," said Ashton; "I won't interrupt any more. The strangeness of this tale makes me feel as if I were losing my wits; but it's altogether too well corroborated not to listen to."

"Now," said the doctor, "for a moment we go back to Haines. I am inclined to think that he got possession of the other half of Franklin's secret, namely, the latitude and longitude of the island where the treasure was buried."

"If he knew that," I ventured, "why wasn't it enough for him! Why didn't he go and find the treasure for himself?"

"He couldn't dig up the whole island," the doctor replied. "I think it not unlikely that he went there, only to learn the futility of proceeding any farther without the map. There is another possible alternative; that he never happened upon the secret of latitude or longitude at all, though he had it lying right under his hand. At any rate, he knew that Morgan had the map. He knew, or felt sure, that with the map he could recover the treasure, and he believed the treasure well worth the trouble of recovering. I can't tell you whether he searched the world for his man, with the definite purpose—the sole purpose of finding him, or whether it was chance that at last, after a lapse of many years, put him upon the trail. But this much I do know, that he found him at last, and that Henry Morgan was murdered as the result of an attempt Haines made to recover the map."

"But the woman!" cried Ashton. "You've told me nothing about her!"

"No," said the doctor. "In order to simplify the story, so far I have left her out, but she plays a very vital part in it. To tell you what that part is, I shall have to go back to the beginning of my story again. I hope I am not boring you." His smile, as he made that polite observation, had a touch of satirical grimness about it.

Ashton laughed a nervous laugh, and wiped his forehead with his handkerchief.

"Bored!" he ejaculated. "Go ahead with the yarn."

"You remember the Maori girl about whom Franklin and Morgan had their quarrel? They were both in love with her. But Morgan murdered Franklin and then disappeared, so that from having two lovers, the girl was left without any. Franklin was, no doubt, the one she cared about, in spite of the fact that he was fat and baldheaded, by no means a romantic type of lover. But he had a charm about him, there's no getting away from that, and he carried it to the day of his death.

"Anyhow, some months after Franklin's death she bore him a daughter. She must have been bitterly disappointed that it was not a son; but, making the best of a bad matter, she swore the child, upon her deathbed, to avenge the murder of her father.

"Well, the girl grew up, and in some way or other—I don't know whether it was by chance or design—she fell into the hands of Josiah Haines, and was used by him as the mere instrument in carrying out his purpose. I don't know certainly whether it was by her aid that he got on Morgan's trail; but this I do know, that he dispatched her to the Oak Ridge house that night for the purpose of stealing Henry Morgan's precious map from him.

"I do not know positively whether he ordered her to murder him by way of exacting recompense for all the trouble his flight had caused, but that is what she did. She made a tourniquet out of a violin string, with two loops in it and a pipe stem, with which she strangled the old man, exactly according to the etiquette of the part of the world from which she comes. And then she came away, but without the map. Two days after the murder she escaped from the hospital, a fact which can't be much of a mystery to anyone who saw her get out of the third story window of Henry Morgan's study, as Phelps and I did the next night."

"An amazing tale," commented Ashton when he had finished. "And yet I've lived in this world long enough to be aware that amazing things are always happening in it, infinitely more amazing than the things men make up to put in books. But you haven't yet told me what connection Wilkins and this housemaid can have with the crime, except by pointing out the coincidence that the girl comes from New Zealand.

"But the thing I most want you to do, the thing I most earnestly beg you to do is to suggest how I can set about finding this wild girl, in whose actual person the crime was committed. I beg of you to give over these elaborate experiments upon people who can't have an important connection with the crime and devote this great mind of yours to the apprehension of the real criminal. If we can get the girl, we shall get hold of her accomplice fast enough, or, perhaps, I should say her principal."

The doctor smiled. "This morning at the breakfast table," he observed, "you were very confident that the police would be able to get hold of her in the course of the day. You said a wild creature like that couldn't remain at liberty. I say it's true she couldn't."

"But," objected Ashton, "she has."

The doctor shrugged his shoulders impatiently. "Why can't you be reasonable?" he asked. "If a thing's impossible, it can't happen. If it's true that a wild creature can't go at large in this community for twenty-four hours without being apprehended, and if it's also true that in twenty-four hours no such creature has been apprehended, then there is only one logical conclusion to come to, namely, that she has ceased to be a wild creature, gibbering in an outlandish language, and has become a much more inconspicuous member of society."

Ashton opened his eyes wide. "What do you mean?"

"Psychology," said the doctor; "hocus-pocus and any of your other names for it that you choose to apply. Didn't you hear me tell Reinhardt at the hospital that that girl was in a hypnotic or subjective state? When a person is in such a state, they can come out of it, and when they come out, they're likely to be altogether different from what they were when they were in that state."

Ashton sprang to his feet. "Do you know where she is?" he demanded. "Or can you describe her so that I and my men can find her?"

"I don't know where she is at this moment," said the doctor quietly. "She was in this room half an hour ago."

In that moment my chief had his revenge for all the flippancies, tolerant contempt, and good-natured sneers with which Ashton had belabored the profession and science which was dearest to his heart. For once the lawyer was beyond the power of speech.

The doctor, too, kept silent for a while to let the momentous nature of the astounding fact which he had just disclosed sink in. Then he began to explain to the astonished attorney.

"I want you to understand very clearly, in the first place, that it has been by my own methods, with the addition, I'll admit, of a little plain, unmerited good luck, that I've solved this mystery. Harvey's testimony at the inquest was my clew. In my examination of him, which I conducted without asking him a single question, without once referring directly to the crime that was committed at Oak Ridge, I proved him innocent as convincingly as the strongest alibi would have proved him innocent, more convincingly, in fact, because the real criminal in this case could prove an alibi, too. And in my further examination of him I discovered Jane Perkins, and without learning her exact address, I ascertained the neighborhood in which she lived. She was the woman with whom the profile on the window shade in the Morgan house associated itself in his mind. Only by a very extraordinary coincidence could this woman, with the same sort of profile, the same colored hair and the same kind of cloak, have been any other than the one whose hands strangled old Morgan.

"The telephone conversation which you held in my laboratory with one of your subordinates settled her identity almost beyond a doubt. The fact that her name was Jane Perkins and that she was a perfectly conventional type of English chambermaid didn't throw me off the track for a moment, because I knew, as you might have known, that the strange, wild personality of the girl we found in the hospital was fugitive, and possibly accidental.

Hard to Eradicate Myths About Snakes

Fear of snakes has led to a belief in various myths about the habits of different species. Children pass along the legend that the hoop snake possesses the power to form itself into a hoop and roll in pursuit of its victim.

Tradition holds that the so-called glass or jointed snake has the ability to break into pieces, and may reassemble itself later—if its head has not been captured or destroyed. Then there is the myth of the stinging snake. Although this snake has a somewhat formidable tail shaped like a horn or spike, it is incapable of piercing or stinging anything with it. Perhaps the most popular of these myths concerns the belief that if one throw a hair from a horse's tail into a river or lake the hair will promptly turn into a water snake and swim.

The BABY

Why do so many, many babies of today escape all the little fretful spells and infantile ailments that used to worry mothers through the day, and keep them up half the night?

If you don't know the answer, you haven't discovered pure, harmless Castoria. It is sweet to the taste, and sweet in the little stomach. And its gentle influence seems felt all through the tiny system. Not even a distasteful dose of castor oil does so much good.

Fletcher's Castoria is purely vegetable, so you may give it freely, at first sign of colic; or constipation; or diarrhea. Or those many times when you just don't know what is the matter. For real sickness, call the doctor, always. At other times, a few drops of Fletcher's Castoria.

The doctor often tells you to do just that; and always says Fletcher's. Other preparations may be just as pure, just as free from dangerous drugs, but why experiment? Besides, the book on care and feeding of babies that comes with Fletcher's Castoria is worth its weight in gold!

Children Cry for Fletcher's CASTORIA

Coal Still Leads in Production of Power

Commercial electricity has been described variously as "juice," "blue magic," "bottled lightning," etc. In the analytical realm of federal statistics, however, it rather takes on the guise of "lumpless coal," "greaseless oil," "knotless timber," "dry water," and "flameless gas."

Coal, water, oil, wood and gas are the ingredients of electricity or are the creative sources of it in the production of power. In the production of some eight hundred million horsepower or 73,791,000,000 kilowatt-hours in this country, 64.5 per cent of the energy was generated by the use of fuels and the remainder by water power, according to the Department of the Interior.

Of the fuels, coal was the leader, producing 90 per cent of the manufactured energy; oil, gas and wood totaled the remaining 10 per cent.

Credit to Motorists?

The automobile has been responsible for the development of a sturdier and incidentally a smarter race of roosters and chickens, according to Richard C. Haldeman, president of the Pennsylvania Motor federation. Haldeman asserts that the large number of chickens killed on the roads during the early days of the automobile age weeded out "mentally unfit roosters and hens." He asserts that instead of being blamed for the chickens which are still killed the motorists should be thanked, for they are aiding the farmer in developing a better grade of fowls.

The Best Laxative He Ever Tried

Mr. W. J. Dorion, New York, writes: "Sick headache, indigestion and constipation have troubled me for years. I tried everything but I can truthfully say your CARTER'S LITTLE LIVER PILLS is the best laxative I have ever used. I find that they are small, easy to take and their action does not pain me. They keep me regular and I want to tell you how I appreciate this purely vegetable medicine, knowing, due to my experience in laboratory work that laxatives, containing Mercury, Calomel and other poisonous drugs are injurious."

CARTER'S LITTLE LIVER PILLS are sugar coated, small, easy to swallow, and everyone in the family can take them in perfect confidence as they are a doctor's own formula.

GIRLHOOD TO MOTHERHOOD

Iowa Woman Found Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Always Helpful

Vinton, Iowa.—"When I was seventeen years old I had to stay at home from school. I finally had to quit school, I was so weak. I suffered for about two years before I took Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, then I picked up one of your books and read it. I began taking the medicine. Now I am a housekeeper with six children, and I have taken it before each one was born. I cannot tell you all the good I have received from it. When I am not as well as can be I take it. I have been doing this for over thirteen years and it always helps me. I read all of your little books I can get and I tell everyone I know what the Vegetable Compound does for me."—MRS. FRANK SELLERS, 510 7th Avenue, Vinton, Iowa.

Many girls in the fourth generation are learning through their own personal experiences the beneficial effects of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. Mothers who took it when they were young are glad to recommend it to their daughters.

For over half a century, women have praised this reliable medicine.

Were Out to Purify Politics

By MARTHA M. WILLIAMS

(Copyright.)

"I TELL you, there's just one thing to do—name Nora Vernon by acclamation," Chairlady Lena Ray snapped at the convention.

In front of her half a dozen women had popped up, crying in chorus, "Why she don't even vote! She'd laugh at us—she's impudent enough for anything"—to all of which Lena held up a silencing hand, saying impressively: "But—she can carry the whole Creek Bottom black settlement."

"How are you so certain she'll get all those votes?" a sharp-faced delegate demanded.

"By findin' out," Lena shrugged. "Jim Whalley, the man we've got to beat, has offered old Unc' Israel the big preacher, five hundred dollars to carry the Creek Bottom for him. And he was told it was all goin' to vote 'de way Miss Nory said.'"

"Oh, Ho! That's why she's here today. I wondered—she's never voted—don't believe in suffrage any more than before we had it," from the sharp-faced one.

Lena glared at her, answering: "She's here—because I asked her to bring me—I'm lame from goin' so hard this last fortnight."

A fringe of men fidgeting on the back seats, began calling raucously: "Do somethin'! Go to it! We can't stay here all day." Voters masculine were mostly tied up with Whalley.

"Right-o," from Lena. "All in favor of Miss Nora Vernon for the legislature please say aye. The ayes have it—" as a fairly lusty shout answered her. "Now—please name a committee to go tell Miss Nora—she's waitin' for me in her car outside."

Chairlady Lena found her victim engaged in chaffing a very handsome young fellow, whom she heartlessly kept standing outside though there was so much space in the car.

"We—we want you—inside," Lena cried. "I've come to fetch you."

"To suffer for my sins?" Nora demanded roguishly—she was mighty pretty, dimpled, rosy, with sparkling brown eyes, and damask-rose cheeks.

"Come along and find out," Lena ordered. Francis Conway hindering in his eagerness to help, Lena scowled at him: "You're in the way. Scoot!" then as Nora went with her a few paces, she said: "Come along. I got to tell you somethin'. You know the legislature's got to elect a senator—now old Mrs. Conway is wild for us to beat Jim Whalley, and since you're the one to beat him, we're just bound to have you run."

"Explain," said Nora stopping short. Lena explained, her voice trembling with excitement, and wound up with: "Now you know, even if you get beat, Mrs. Conway will love you for runnin'—but if you won't do that and Jim Whalley wins—why you may just as well hang your harp on the willow tree as far as any chance of ever being Mrs. Francis Conway, junior, goes."

Nora laid hands upon her friend's shoulders. "Lena, I believe in you—but tell me this: Are you women not out to purify politics?"

"Certain and sure!" from Lena. "That's one reason we're so bent on cookin' Jim Whalley's goose. Such a corruptionist—offerin' those poor folk money to vote for him—"

"Is it worse than offering to bribe me into a candidacy, with a senatorial mother-in-law?"

Lena staggered slightly, crying, "Why, don't you see—all the difference in the world. You're fit for the place—more'n anybody in the county—you've got influence—you will do it credit—Jim Whalley will sell out to the highest bidder—"

"Old Mrs. Conway has money—why doesn't she buy him? I'm not for sale—even at the price of her son," from Nora.

"But—but don't you see it's your duty. You did in the dry time what no man had the wit nor heart to do. If you lead the folks you helped into the right way, think of how your example may spread!"

"Not much chance of it," said Nora firmly. "Greed will beat humanity, three in the game, every time. I don't think women should vote—just because they are women. They see things clear enough, and judge them rightly enough until the personal equation comes in. Then—they feel anything is lawful, that helps them get their own way. I'm a woman—therefore, I don't vote at home—wouldn't I be a pretty spectacle popping up to vote for—senators and taxes and things!"

"Honey—I didn't think you would turn me down—not this hard," Lena groaned. "Ain't the least harm in votin'—it'll come to help a heap when we fairly get the hang of it. If you can't nor won't take the place isn't there somebody you'd give your strength to?"

Nora looked reflective—then a smile hovered about her lips as she said: "Why don't you try draftin' Frank Conway? I'm not offering a bribe—not even a trade—but if he should be nominated I think all my real friends would vote for him."

"You're an angel twice over," Lena gasped, then darting back toward the car where a disconsolate Francis sat in wait: "Come along! Quick! Nora's goin' inside with me—to see you started on a political career."

"On his promise not to try purifying politics," Nora supplemented with her wickedest smile.

Small Yankees Show Skill in Arithmetic

A perfect score in addition was made in two towns in New England in a recent arithmetic contest sponsored by Boston university. Returns were received from approximately 113,000 children. The greatest accuracy as a whole was shown by pupils in small rural schools. The next highest score was the 91.6 per cent made in addition by pupils in both the fifth and seventh grades. No perfect scores were made in subtraction, multiplication or division. The highest scores in each of these subjects were made by seventh-grade pupils, who averaged 93.5 in subtraction, 57.1 in multiplication and 86 per cent in division.

Fourth Annual Smoker Was a Rousing Success

Those Who Attended Are Satisfied It's the Best Time They Had For Many Years.

The Men's Smoker which was held here in the school house on Saturday evening was a big success. This is the fourth smoker which has been held here and the crowd which came to take in the doings was the largest that has ever attended any of the smokers.

Many from Thief River Falls came up and several of the gentlemen from that city assisted with the program, which was a long and interesting one.

The Holt Commercial Cub received many compliments on its success in establishing such a good feeling in the community. Proof of this good feeling was plainly evident when, at 7:30 in the evening, cars and teams from all corners of this territory began to pour into town.

Stewart McLeod of Goodridge, President of the 17th district of the Land O' Lakes Association, gave an interesting talk on that organization and what it does for the farmers.

The HoltCommercialClub hereby wishes to thank those who assisted in putting on the program, preparing the lunch, and otherwise helping to make the Smoker a success.

The business men of Holt appreciate the friendliness of the farmers of this community and hope that the bonds of friendship will strengthen. They also hope that they may be able to entertain them again in the future.

Ladies Had Good Time

The program and luncheon which the ladies had in the church basement Saturday evening was reported as being one of the most enjoyable that the ladies of Holt and vicinity had attended for some time.

All kinds of games were on the program, but the "stellar attractions" were the basketball game and the husband-calling contest. In the latter, Mrs. Chas. Skoglund walked off with high honors:

The lunch, altho somewhat different from what the men had at the smoker, made up a very good menu.

The ladies of Holt are to be congratulated upon the splendid way in which they entertained their lady friends from the country.

The Big Dance

The Dance which was held at the Community Hall after the two doings mentioned above, was given free to those who attended the two doings, and was reported by many of the farmers who took it in as being one of the most respectable and enjoyable dances they had ever attended.

The Holt Commercial Club, however, neglected to have a door-keeper at the Hall while the other doings were in full swing; so, to their sorrow, when they were all ready for the dance at the Community Hall, they found it packed with people from neighboring towns, who had come to take advantage of the free fun. As it was then up to the Commercial Club to make room for the home people to dance, those who had jammed into the Hall were asked to vacate, and give the Holt people a chance to dance.

The Commercial Club hopes that the outsiders (some of whom had to be held up and carried out on account of their imbibing too much of High Spirits) will not harbor any bad feelings against them on account of being asked to leave the Hall and giving the home bunch a chance. The Club was fully justified in this action, as the advertising in this matter read: "Free Dance To All Who Attend These Programs."

In Conclusion---

The three entertainments taken all total made up the most stupendous entertainment the people of Holt and vicinity have had for a long time. It confirmed the statement: "The more we get together, the happier we will be." Without the shadow of a doubt, those who attended are satisfied it's the best time they have had in years.

His Sheep and Hens Also Eat Silage

F. D. Voth, of Holt, Minnesota is a booster for silos and silage says The Farmer of St. Paul.

"In 1923 I put up a silo and my cows increased an average of 50 pounds of butterfat per cow on less grain and one-third less hay. I had been feeding bundle corn, hay and grain before I put up the silo. I never want to be without a silo as long as I have milk cows or any other kind of cattle. I feed silage to sheep and chickens as well as to cows and young stock."

F. D. Voth, Holt, Minn.

Mr. Voth's herd of 12 grade and purebred Holstein cows averages about 360 pounds of butterfat per year. He has increased the production from 200 pounds per cow nine years ago by the use of purebred sires, intelligent culling based on production records which he himself keeps on his cows, and better feeding methods, including especially the use of corn silage and alfalfa hay.

Opened New Creamery

A new farmers' co-operative creamery was opened at Lancaster on Thursday of last week. The people of this community who have enjoyed a good co-operative creamery the past twenty years, and who today realize of what value one is to the farmers, congratulate the people of Lancaster upon their success in organizing one of these good institutions, and wish them success in their venture.

Notice!

I want to thank Mr. Anderson, our local buttermaker, for his flattering remarks concerning me and my business, in last week's issue of the NEWS.

I feel that those who are selling cream will bring their cream to whichever place they wish. I don't intend to use our local newspaper as a place in which to insult other people and knock their business.

SHE WENT FROM BAD TO WORSE

Down to 98 Pounds—Finally Restored to Health by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Cleveland, Ohio.—"After having my first baby, I lost weight, no matter what I did. Then a doctor told me I would be better if I had another baby, which I did. But I got worse, was always sickly and went down to 98 pounds. My neighbor told me about Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, as it helped her very much, so I tried it. After taking four bottles, I weigh 116 pounds. It has just done wonders for me and I can do my housework now without one bit of trouble."—Mrs. M. Riessinger, 10004 Nelson Ave., Cleveland, Ohio.

Health? That's the best gift. Health is riches that gold cannot buy and surely health is cause enough for happiness.

LIVING INDIAN MAY BE 180 YEARS OLD

Doubters Admit He Must Be at Least 145.

Los Angeles, Calif.—Thirty years before the Stars and Stripes were adopted as the American standard in the midst of the War of Independence, a man who still lives first saw the light of the sun, if Indian gossip be true.

The man is Captain Sam, or Sam Fish, whose cabin is in the Indian village near June lake in the high Sierras.

No one knows how old is Captain Sam. Residents of the region affirm he is the oldest man in California. perhaps the oldest in the world.

Captain Sam does not say. What matters a few moons more, a few moons less, when so many have passed over his head?

Tribal tales indicate that Captain Sam is one hundred and eighty years of age. White men who scout this figure admit it is not improbable he had seen 145 winters.

There are more than one hundred Indians in Captain Sam's family Those far along in years recall tale he once told at camp fires, years ago. Nowadays, white men strive in vain to have him impart his memories of the past.

The stories of his relatives indicate that Captain Sam was a grown man, a leader of his tribe, when the Donner party went through the upper Owens valley nearly a century ago.

This was the first party of whites to traverse the region. Relatives of Captain Sam recall the accounts he gave them of his astonishment at seeing white men and women for the first time.

Often Captain Sam sits in the sun by his cabin door, holding in his arms his latest descendant, a papoose of three months. He has lost track of the generations of his family. The papoose is believed to be his great-great-great-great-great-grandson.

Yearly the Piutes and other tribes hold a four-day festival of sports and tribal dances at June lake. Nowadays, Captain Sam is carried thither on a birch litter, and is honored with revivals of ancient ceremonies.

Each year when the festival is completed—this year it was held the first four days of July—the celebrators wonder if Captain Sam will be with them when the next fete comes around.

Egyptian Queen's Tomb, 4,500 Years Old, Found

Cambridge, Mass.—Discovery of the tomb of Queen Meresankh III, which closes gaps in Egyptian history of the Fourth dynasty, has been made by the Harvard university museum of fine arts expedition, says a report received here from Dr. George A. Reisner, head of the exploring party. Queen Meresankh was the great-granddaughter of Queen Hetepheres and King Snerefu, mother and father of Cheops, builder of the great pyramid.

The report says the newly discovered tomb is remarkable for the vivid colors of the relics and inscriptions which seem to have retained all their brilliancy after 4,500 years.

The burial chamber was plundered thousands of years ago and no valuables have been found. Two inscriptions, one on either side of the doorway, reveal that 272 days elapsed between the queen's death and her burial.

Plan Loud Speakers for Indian Mosque

Calcutta.—Microphones and loud speakers are to be installed in the new Nakhuda mosque here, which when completed will hold more than 14,000 worshipers. There will also be two minarets equipped with powerful electric lights for calling the faithful to worship.

The old historic Nakhuda mosque was demolished some time ago and a new edifice is now being constructed to take its place. This building will be of reinforced concrete with a steel frame and will be complete with all the latest devices of modern science which will enable the congregation to hear better the injunctions of the imam.

The pulpit of the imam will be on the first floor but will be visible from the two floors above.

German Family Holds Longevity Record

Berlin.—The record for longevity probably belongs to a German family named Luntzel. Frau Franziska Quenfell, born Luntzel, who lives in Berlin, has just celebrated her hundredth birthday. Of her nine brothers and sisters three lived to be more than one hundred years old and five were past ninety when they died.

Frau Quenfell, who was born on a farm, organized the first League of Patriotic Women in Germany and was its president for 25 years. She is in full possession of all her faculties, and follows current events with keen interest. The Prussian prime minister sent her an official message of felicitation on her birthday, and accompanied it with a piece of porcelain from the state porcelain works as a gift of the government.

TIGER'S OPINIONS SECRET UNTIL DEATH

Clemenceau Spends Time Thinking and Writing.

St. Vincent-Sur-Jard, France.—Whether he is in his Paris home in the Rue Franklin or in his summer abode on this windswept Vendean shore, Georges Clemenceau, who has just passed his eighty-sixth birthday, spends most of his time writing and thinking. He invariably refuses to talk politics, although they occupied the biggest part of his active life. What does he write?

He is engaged now, and has been for several years, on a volume or series of volumes which are understood to resume his outlook on life and its problems. But they are not to be published until after his death and the "Tiger" has not revealed anything of their content. Therefore it is only by a reference to his published books that one can obtain any adequate idea of the principles on which he has guided his career and the lessons he has drawn from his study of humanity.

Simplicity of Writings.

It is not a difficult task because whatever Clemenceau wrote is marked by simplicity of thought and presentation, however complex the problems involved. In philosophy he is a disciple of the Stoics. He has taken for himself the phrase of Spinoza: "Nothing may be called perfect or imperfect; everything happens in conformity with an eternal natural order."

It was after his political eclipse in 1894 that Clemenceau had an opportunity to develop his extraordinary talent as a writer. In his newspaper La Justice he touched on every phase of human activity and a year later published in a volume entitled "La Melee Sociale" (The Social Conflict), practically all his daily articles arranged in logical order. The leitmotif of all is the "struggle for existence." He paints realistic pictures of human suffering, long hours in factories, poverty, vice, brutality and pity side by side, prostitution, exploitation, injustice of a hundred kinds.

He does not apportion praise or blame. He merely tells what he has seen and asks only that men of understanding work with all their power to make the world better.

"What," he asks, "will come after this universe? How, if ever, will the primal nebula be reformed? In how many billion years? With what new power of life? All hypotheses. I offer you nothing, not feeling that I am responsible for anything in the universal scheme of things."

Sometimes Clemenceau seems to be a socialist, as in fact he proclaimed himself at the opening of his parliamentary career. This, in another article of "La Melee Sociale," he declares that "the end toward which nature seems to be striving is socialism, which will fix by law respect for all, the rule of justice by association." But in the next moment he proclaims that everything depends on the individual, that the individual must be brought to such a point that law will be unnecessary, which may certainly be taken as an expression of philosophic anarchy.

Does His Own Marketing.

After all, skepticism is his dominant trait, in his daily life as in his writings. He has lived all his life in close contact with the Breton peasant. He knows their ways and has had many proofs that he is revered by them. Yet, when he goes to market in the nearby town of Les Sables d'Olonne, as he does two or three times a week, he conducts his own bargaining, he counts the change, he weighs in his gray-gloved hands the leg of mutton or the chicken he intends for dinner and he replies to the good-natured protests of the market women: "Oh, tres bien, tres bien, but you can't catch me with your old tricks."

It has been often said that Clemenceau is anti-religious. He is merely nonreligious. Even in the worst days of the fight between the radical extremists and the radical freethinkers and the church authorities, when the separation of church and state was the big problem in France, Clemenceau repeated time and again that there must be no attempt to suppress religion or to persecute anybody for religious beliefs.

"Governments," he declared in the chamber, "can do nothing against beliefs. I have been asked if we want to destroy religion. Well, messieurs les deputes, here is my reply: We do not want to, we could not if we would, destroy a single belief in a single conscience."

In one of his books, "Le Grand Pan," he takes up the problem of the inspiring principle of mankind. He finds it in action.

"Pan commands us," he said. "We must act. Action is the principle, action is the means, action is the goal."

Clemenceau has followed that principle all his life. In spite of his years he has his half hour of physical training every day. In Paris he has an instructor. Here he does it alone.

WALL FLOWERS TO HAVE THEIR DAY

Vision Dance of Future Enjoyed in a Chair.

London.—Ballrooms and night club habitues of the future will enjoy their dancing sitting down, thinks Prof. A. M. Low, who has been taking a scientific peek into the future of the human race.

There will be little use for legs or arms, he contends, because in the age of the future almost everything will be done by machinery. It will be a pill age, when all food will be concentrated and a meal will go down with one gulp.

But rhythm will be sought as long as the human brain functions properly, and on this account, Professor Low points out, men and women will never get over their fondness for dancing, though it may be taken in quite a different form of that of today—which has its disadvantages owing to the physical exertion of keeping time with the band.

"In the distant future, when constant disuse will have atrophied our legs, we shall probably take our dancing sitting quietly, while drugs and revolving lights give us all the sensations of rhythm without the stuffy atmosphere of the ballroom and the cafes," Professor Low asserts.

The minute research of modern scientists enables them to realize the remarkable part played by rhythmical motion in the universe, he says.

"Present-day dancing is merely the result of wartime hysteria," avers the professor. "Women, in particular, are generally more or less hysterical at the end of a dance which has excited them and chased the cares of life into oblivion.

"This period will pass, and we shall find that more and more intoxicating effects, such as sweet perfumes, oscillating floors and curious foods will be necessary before we can enjoy rhythm.

"Dancing there will always be, but it cannot long remain as it is now—a mere concession to physical disability. The time will come, I believe, when we shall cease to find pleasure in it unless it is accompanied by injections, vibromassage and speed sensations.

"I look forward to the time when it will be possible to broadcast sensations direct to the mind."

Evangeline's People Rebuild After Flood

St. Martinsville, La.—Evangeline would have cause, indeed, to weep beneath the aged oak on the banks of Bayou Teche were she alive today, but in her sorrow there would also be pride.

For struggling in the disaster of this Mississippi flood, which drove them once again into exile, the modern Acadians are rebuilding their homes to resume their place among the picturesque beauty of water hyacinths and moss-draped, spreading oaks.

Penniless, without even the promise of a crop to replace those destroyed, some of the Acadians are seeking new lands. On one deserted, half-wrecked farmhouse is the tell-tale sign: "For Sale—Cheap."

But most of the quaint people are made of hardier stuff. Many of the houses are gleaming with new paint, and the fields are plowed and planted in seed. Their great hope is safely from floods of the future.

Records Prove Murders Grow in Pennsylvania

Harrisburg, Pa.—Murder is becoming more and more common in Pennsylvania, while suicide is on the decrease, records in the offices of the state department of health here show.

During the first six months of this year there were 243 deaths in the state classed as homicide; in the same period of 1926 there were 236 murders, while in 1925, during the first half of the year, there were only 231.

This year the first six months saw 532 suicides compared to 551 in the same period last year.

Deaths due to alcoholism also have been on the increase during the three-year period, the records revealed. In the first six months of the year there were 207 deaths, compared to 189 in 1926 and 203 in 1925.

A heavy increase in automobile fatalities also is shown. This year there were 784 deaths in the first half, compared to 651 in 1926 and 606 in 1925.

Wilbur Says Radio Saved 19,000 Lives

Washington.—Radio made it possible for the United States to avoid serious conflicts in two countries—China and Nicaragua—where its armed forces were protecting Americans, Secretary Wilbur of the navy said in an address recently before the telephone and telegraph sections of the American Railway association.

Through radio communication, decisions of leaders of the American forces in those countries could be placed before the President and his cabinet, he said, and in a few moments the latter's instructions could be sent back to the foreign countries. He added that if it had not been for the radio and airplanes in the Mississippi flood 19,000 lives would have been lost.

The BABY

No mother in this enlightened age would give her baby something she did not know was perfectly harmless, especially when a few drops of plain Castoria will right a baby's stomach and end almost any little ill. Fretfulness and fever, too; it seems no time until everything is serene.

That's the beauty of Castoria; its gentle influence seems just what is needed. It does all that castor oil might accomplish, without shock to the system. Without the evil taste. It's delicious! Being purely vegetable, you can give it as often as there's a sign of colic; constipation; diarrhea; or need to aid sound, natural sleep.

Just one warning: it is genuine Fletcher's Castoria that physicians recommend. Other preparations may be just as free from all doubtful drugs, but no child of this writer's is going to test them! Besides, the book on care and feeding of babies that comes with Fletcher's Castoria is worth its weight in gold.

Clean Kidneys By Drinking Lots of Water

Take Salts to Flush Kidneys if Bladder Bothers or Back Hurts

Eating too much rich food may produce kidney trouble in some form, says a well-known authority, because the acids created excite the kidneys. Then they become overworked, get sluggish, clog up and cause all sorts of distress, particularly backache and misery in the kidney region, rheumatic twinges, severe headaches, acid stomach, constipation, torpid liver, sleeplessness, bladder and urinary irritation.

The moment your back hurts or kidneys aren't acting right, or if bladder bothers you, begin drinking lots of good water and also get about four ounces of Jad Salts from any good pharmacy; take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast for a few days and your kidneys may then act fine. This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to flush clogged kidneys and stimulate them to activity; also to neutralize the acids in the system so that they no longer irritate, thus often relieving bladder disorders.

Jad Salts cannot injure anyone; makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink which millions of men and women take now and then to help keep the kidneys and urinary organs clean, thus often avoiding serious kidney disorders.

"I'll confess that when she first came into this room my belief in her physical identity with the woman I had seen in Henry Morgan's study was shaken for an instant, for her whole appearance, not only of face, but the articulation and poise of body was strikingly different. But with the second look, the resemblance began to shape itself. When I saw the tattoo mark on her arm, that, of course, reduced the case to a certainty.

"It took only a dozen questions to convince me that in the person of Jane Perkins she was totally ignorant of the crime, which was exactly what I expected. I then hypnotized her, and succeeded in fishing up her other personality, from whom I got not only the admission that she had strangled Henry Morgan, but a considerable part of the story which I have just been telling you of the events which led up to the commission of the crime. She did not recover the personality of Jane Perkins until I called her out from the inner room to begin the examination."

By that time Ashton began to come out of his daze, had recovered again the powers of speech and motion, which the astounding nature of the doctor's revelation had temporarily deprived him of.

"She mustn't be at large another minute," he said.

He walked across the room toward the telephone.

"Wait" commanded the doctor. "There's plenty of time. You haven't got the whole story yet, and you may spoil everything if you move without it. The girl's part of the crime is only half of it, and the least important part at that. She was hardly more than a passive instrument. The party you want, the important one to get, is the man who sent her on that fatal errand to the lonely house in Oak Ridge that night. The man you want is Josiah Haines."

At that a smoldering spark of incredulity in Ashton's mind was fanned into a flame.

"Come," he said; "you have told me that the wild South Sea island girl of this story is really Jane Perkins; but you aren't going to tell me that Josiah Haines is a submerged and secondary consciousness beneath the urbane exterior of our friend Wilkins. That would be drawing it a bit too strong, wouldn't it?"

Without making any answer, the doctor turned back to his instrument, replaced upon it the megaphone which had been there during the conduct of the examination, and made some trifling adjustments in the instrument. And then, once more, addressed the attorney.

"You thought I was joking," he said, "when I told Wilkins that this instrument was a phonopneumosphygmograph. The name, perhaps, is a bit clumsy. It is rather a description of the instrument, rather than a handy name for it. It is three instruments in one. A phonograph first, by which sounds are recorded upon a moving cylinder in such manner that they can be reproduced. In exactly the same manner the pulse of a person on whose wrist this little instrument is strapped is recorded in the wax of the cylinder. So it is also, a recording sphygmograph. And thirdly, and last of all, the elastic strap which I fastened around Wilkins' chest had its two ends connected by a little instrument which registered, very scientifically and very truly, every movement of his respiration. Everything, from the slightest, most faintly drawn breath to a gasp, will be indicated by that little instrument and recorded along with a pulse beat on the same cylinder which records the sounds. The long thin tube there that looks like a thermometer will show, when I start this instrument going, exactly how the man I was examining breathed; when he held his breath, when he caught it, when he expelled it. And the bulb which you see, half filled with the red liquid, will show you the way his heart was beating."

Ashton turned away. "It's hideous," he said; "it's inhuman. I can't look at it;" and as he spoke, he walked away to the other side of the room.

But he came back and stood beside us when the phonograph began again reporting the questions the doctor had asked the girl about Will Harvey, and her answers to them.

"What's this part of the examination for?" Ashton asked. "You know all about it, and you'd sprung your mine on Wilkins."

"There's another mine of a different sort a little further along," said the doctor. "I wanted to give him time to recover his self-possession, to persuade himself that that, too, was all a false alarm; that my mention of the names of Haines and Franklin was just a coincidence.

"You see," he concluded, "I had two people to reckon with—himself and you."

"Me?" Ashton questioned.

"Yes, you and your incredulity. I knew that if I concluded the examination there, that long before I could make this demonstration to you, Wilkins would have made good his escape; and a man like that, once he got away, is cunning enough to be hard to find. So I wanted not only to calm his fears, but to provide him with a positive incentive for staying around."

Ashton would have spoken, but at that moment, with a suddenly upraised hand, the doctor motioned him to silence and to renewed attention.

I had had my eye upon the instrument all the time the doctor had been talking, and had seen that by now the doctor's questions concerning Harvey had had the effect he wanted. Wilkins' pulse and respiration were back almost to normal again.

"'—would ever take us very close to old Henry Morgan with his maps and his mysteries.'"

The word "map" caused a throb and a flutter both in the tube and the bulb, much as the word "New Zealand" had done at the beginning of the examination. The recovery was immediate, however, and during the silence which followed, the condition in the tube and the bulb became more nearly normal than it had been since the beginning of the examination.

He Walked Across the Room to the Telephone.

At the end of the silence, the phonograph began reporting the doctor's apparently irrelevant aside to Ashton, in which he had told him of the discovery of the one queer map which the detectives had overlooked, a large scale map which showed neither latitude nor longitude. As he began to talk about it, both pulse and breathing, as the instrument revealed them, began to tell another story, not a story of terror this time, but of excitement. The pulse quickened, but it grew stronger, too, steadily stronger, and steadily more rapid, until it was leaping like the heart of a man who, in the midst of battle, catches a gleam of victory. And the column of liquid in the respiration tube rose clear to the top of it, and then fell to the bottom. The man had been drawing great long, steady breaths of triumph.

"'—and I brought it here with me this morning,'" the phonograph was saying in the doctor's voice, "'and I'll show it to you directly if you care to look at it.'"

There was a little silence after that, and then, still from the megaphone of the instrument, there came another voice, a voice which it had not recorded before, the voice of Wilkins, the polite, imperturbable, the obsequious.

"'I beg your pardon, sir. I wonder if you could spare me now. I'm supposed to be in the dining room at this hour.'"

"He'll be back," said the doctor grimly. "That map has been the focal point of his life for a good many years. He would run a bigger risk than he could possibly think lay in breaking into this apartment, to get it. He's on duty in the dining room until twelve, and I imagine he'll stay there, but as far as we're concerned, it's only a question of putting out our lights and waiting."

Ashton nodded. "By the way," he said, "I'd like to see that map. It must be something of a curiosity."

"If you'll come out to Oak Ridge with me tomorrow," said the doctor, "I'll take pleasure in showing it to you. There's nothing in the envelope. It was only necessary to make Wilkins think there was."

"But where's the envelope itself?" Ashton asked. "Didn't you say it was here on the table? I don't see it."

The doctor whirled round as if something had stung him. Never before, I think, in all the years I have known him had I seen him so completely taken aback as he was at that moment.

"It must be somewhere," said I. "It was lying in plain sight when the doctor spoke to you about it."

But it was all in vain that we rummaged among the littered papers upon the table top. The big manila envelope was gone.

CHAPTER IX

For a moment we stood gazing blankly into each other's faces, stupidly trying to realize, to the full, what the disappearance of that big, empty manila envelope meant. Ashton was the first to recover himself. He shot a quick question at me.

"Do you remember, Phelps, whether or not, when Wilkins spoke of the ventilator being foul, you glanced in the direction of it?"

"Yes," I admitted I did.

"You?" questioned Ashton, turning to the doctor.

"Oh, yes," said Doctor McAlister. "There's no fool like an old fool."

"Well, I did, too," said Ashton, "and that's when Wilkins took the envelope."

He pulled out his watch, frowned at it, snapped it shut and put it back into his pocket.

"I didn't realize this demonstration had taken so long," said he. "He's had nearly an hour. He probably ripped open the envelope the moment he closed the door behind him, and, finding it empty, would know, of course, that the thing had been merely a trap to catch him."

"And it's my fault, Ashton," said the doctor contritely. "I was guilty of an absurd piece of over-confidence. I knew he'd want the map, and no other way of his getting it occurred to me, than that he should come back here when he supposed we were all asleep, and let himself in with a pass key and steal it."

But the man he spoke to was already the other side of the room, standing before the telephone and shaking up and down the little hook which supports the receiver.

"Give me the dining room, please," we heard him say. "The dining room? This is Mr. Ashton. I'd like to speak with Wilkins."

It was easy to guess the nature of the reply he got to that request, from the question or two which he interjected into it and from his attitude as he turned away and hung up the receiver.

"It's as I thought. He's not been in the dining room since he went off duty after the dinner hour. They wondered what had become of him, and sent a messenger up to his room in the servant's quarters. The messenger reports the room locked and dark."

"He has an hour's clear start," exclaimed the doctor, "thanks to my stupidity."

"Well," said Ashton, "he hasn't got off yet, by any means. It's a straight police case now, and I think they're likely to get him—if not in this city, at least before he can leave the country, which is undoubtedly what he will try to do."

He turned back to the telephone and called up police headquarters, attempted to, rather, listened a moment to something that was being said to him, and then turned away with a very wry face.

"Well, our friend Wilkins is playing in luck all right," he said. "The local operator tells me that we have no outside connection at all. Both the telephone and the local station here of the Western Union are out of commission on account of this confounded sleet."

City Life Tending to Wipe Out Sex Lines

City life is rapidly making women masculine and men feminine, contends a writer in Liberty. "Male and female created He them," the writer points out, "but the cities have altered His plan and more and more are wiping out sex lines.

"The male and female work at the same tasks," the writer explains, "ride the same subways, drive the same cars, play the same games, see the same shows. More and more, therefore, they think the same thoughts and have the same feelings.

"Man is as adaptable to his environment as a chameleon is. The unsexing of men and women through city life is natural. City life softens men, makes them shrink from discomforts, standardizes their lives and thoughts. City life hardens women. The first ride in a crowded subway train is a shock to the natural modesty of a girl.

"Cities are necessary in this complicated modern world. The country is the great restorer. Our dandified clerks and office workers, restored to the farm, quickly revert to shaving every other day or once a week, wearing old clothes, and stabbing across the table with a fork. In war the counter-jumpers begin to sing bass in a few months and revert to cave-man tactics."

Optimist Points Out Silver Lining to Cloud

Barney Oldfield, the famous automobilist, said on disembarking at New York from his European tour:

"We are capturing more and more of the European automobile trade. In London, Paris, everywhere, you see thousands of American automobiles. Some people say that our trade is going to suffer in Europe now on account of hard times and so on, but for many reasons I don't accept that view. I'm an optimist there.

"The fact is, I'm an optimist everywhere. All things, I claim have their bright side.

"Take, for instance, the old saying that few people practice what they preach. That is very sad, of course, but how much sadder it would be if we all preached what we practice!"

Young At 60, Or Old At 40? Diet Decides

Women are as old or as young as their state of health. A woman may be young at sixty years or old at forty. It all depends on her physical well-being.

Youth and beauty have a foundation in sound health. And food is easily the most important item in health. In giving consideration to the subjects of diet and beauty, women should not forget the food essentials that make for the preservation of teeth, hair, figure and complexion.

Blame for round shoulders, flat chest and poor teeth among women is due in large measure to faulty diet, or, specifically, to a lack of lime and phosphorus. Milk, or evaporated milk, which is simply cow's milk with 60 per cent of the water taken away, is especially rich in lime.

Because of the concentration of evaporated milk, which is regulated by government standards, it is of double the richness of ordinary market milk, as is shown in the following table:

Ordinary Milk.
Fat	3.5 to 4	per cent
Sugar (lactose)	4.5 to 4.75	per cent
Proteins	3.5 to 4	per cent
Minerals	.7 to .75	per cent
Evaporated Milk.
Fat	7.8 to 8.2	per cent
Sugar (lactose)	9.5 to 10	per cent
Proteins	7.5 to 8.2	per cent
Minerals	1.4 to 1.6	per cent

A quart of milk a day for adults is recommended by doctors not only because of its high mineral content, but for the reasons that it helps keep the digestive tract in proper condition, strengthens the body to resist disease, and gives proper balance to the diet.

Salads also play an important part in the dietary. Some sort of a salad, lettuce, tomato, fresh fruit, cabbage or vegetable, should be eaten at least once a day. Neither is the daily menu complete without a generous quality of coarse, leafy vegetables, valuable for their high vitamin content. Fruit juices also have very beneficial properties.

If a woman follows out the rules of diet, birthdays to her will be nothing more than an excuse for a celebration.

Anton Sagstuen returned home on Monday from Radium where he has spent a couple of weeks at the home of his brother, Ludwig Sagstuen and family.

Gabriel Must Wait

A Paris husband is responsible for an opinion to the effect that when Gabriel stands, with one foot on the land and one foot on the sea, to proclaim that time shall be no more, every married woman on earth will rush to the door and exclaim:

"I'm not quite ready, you'll have to wait a bit."

A citizen who heard this statement, said the woman would not be the only factor with whom the angel would have to recken. All the lawyers, he added, would throw up their office windows and shout:

"You can't do that, Gabriel; it's unconstitutional!"

From all of which it seems, there may be difficulties in the way of Judgement Day.

Happy Wedlock Sure Thing If Bride Is Cook

By KATHRYN ST. JOHN

Haphazard meals yearly ruin thousands of marriages. Most marital ships would maintain an evener keel if brides knew cooking.

Many of the first year's troubles between newlyweds would be avoided if the wife were capable of preparing foods with an experienced hand. Wives are to blame for the failure of many business men in the final analysis. The business man's health depends a great deal on what he eats. And it's up to his wife to see that he gets the right kind of food. A healthfully balanced diet goes a long way toward making the tired business man less fatigued.

The expert home manager sees to it that her husband never comes home to a delicatessen lunch. There is a carefully planned meal waiting for him. The real housewife knows that an unbalanced diet means trouble and avoids it. Likewise, she appreciates the fact that variation in her menus is important. In this connection the following recipes have been selected as an aid to the home manager:

Frozen Salad.

¼ cup mayonnaise dressing	½ cup candied cherries
⅓ cup diced pineapple	½ cup diced bananas
4 tbsp. pineapple juice	2 tbsp. lemon juice
½ cup cream	½ cup evaporated milk

Mix the fruit and juices. Combine milk and cream, chill and whip; then fold in the fruit and mayonnaise. Pour into a mold and pack in equal parts of salt and ice. Serve on lettuce leaves. This serves eight.

Orange Bavarian.

1 tbsp. gelatin	2-3 cup evaporated milk
¼ cup cold water
1 cup orange juice	1-3 cup whipping cream
3 tbsp. lemon juice
⅛ tsp. salt	⅝ cup sugar

Soak gelatin in cold water, add fruit juices, sugar and salt. Heat in the top of a double boiler until gelatin dissolves. Strain and set in pan of cold water. When mixture begins to set, fold in the evaporated milk and cream which have been beaten stiff.

Banana Ice Cream.

6 very ripe bananas	2 cups evaporated milk
½ cup lemon juice	2 cups cream
2¼ cups sugar	⅛ tsp. salt

Scrape off adhering fibrous portion on surface of peeled bananas. Mash and rub through a sieve. Add the rest of the ingredients in the order given and stir until all are well blended. Let stand for 20 minutes so that all sugar may dissolve. Freeze in a 1 to 6 salt-ice mixture. This recipe makes ½ gallon cream.

Bankers Meet

The question of whether a service charge shall be made at this time on small checking accounts in Marshall county banks came up for discussion by members of the Marshall County Bankers Association at a meeting held in the Masonic lodge rooms at Warren on Thursday night. Officers for the year were also elected at the meeting.

The problem of making a service charge on small checking accounts has been studied at length by Marshall county bankers. The banks serve as bookkeepers in the modern method of doing business and also furnish all supplies without charge. Accordingly, small, active checking accounts are carried by the banks at a loss. Polk and Pennington county banks have made such a charge for some time and recently a similar move was made in Roseau county.

H. I. Yetter of Stephen was elected president of the county association at which all of the banks in the county were represented. Other officers include Geo. C. Magoris of Warren, vice-president; W. R. Holbrook of Warren, secretary, and O. T. Johnson of Oslo, treasurer.

Manual Larson returned home from Moorhead on Thursday for a few days' visit.

Geo. Fricker and P. Palmer visited at the Fred Voth home Monday evening.

The Chicken dinner which was to be given at the Lutheran church Sunday was called of on account of their being so many cases of sickness in the community. The dinner will probably be held at a later date.

Martin Kisch who has farmed in Excel towship for many years, has decided to quit that business and will hold a big auction sale at his farm tomorrow (Saturday) at 1 p. m. Mr. Kisch will take a trip back to old country for a visit with relatives.

Several auto loads of farmers and businessmen from here spent Wednesday and Thursday at Warren were they attended the Red River Valley Dairymens Convention. Those who took in the convention reported that the programs were very interesting and that they had enjoyed a good time while there.

Alma Nybo Died

Alma Nybo, the little three old daughter of Mrs. J. Nybo died on Saturday afternoon at about 3 o'clock while being taken to the hospital at Thief River. The cause of death was given as diphtheria. Mrs. Nybo was unable to be at the funeral of her son Oscar, on Saturday on account of the sickness of some of the other children.

No one can realize the sorrow of Mrs. Nybo in losing two of her children in one week. Funeral services for Oscar Nybo was held in the Mission church Saturday afternoon, Rev. O. I. Raaum officiated. The remains were laid to rest in the Holt Cemetery. On account of the sickness which caused the death of the little girl, a private funeral was held and her remains were laid to rest beside her brother.

Some of the local nimrods were out wolf hunting Sunday.

A good sized crowd attended the basket social at the Riverside school Saturday evening.

Dr. Melby of Thief River was at the school here on Monday and cacinated about a hundred of the children.

SHORT LESSONS IN DAIRYING

A series of 52 articles by Land O' Lakes Creameries and published by the Farmers Cooperative Creamery in the interests of its patrons.

LESSON I.

As profit is the purpose of dairying, it is well to begin these lessons by considering income from the cows. At prevailing cooperative creamery prices for butterfat an income of $100 per cow a year may be considered fair, $150 very good and $200 excellent, or an income of from $8 to $16 per cow per month.

To know the actual income from the cows and what it should be in order to be profitable is the beginning of good dairying.

Divide the income from the creamery by the number of cows and it will give the amount per cow for the month or for the year.

The cow is the first factor. It pays to study her—her production, her fat, her care, her history. These matters will be considered in future issues.

Cut out these lessons and save them for future reference. They will cover the whole field of dairying.

France Lures the Woman Shopper

Does Yearly Business of $157,000,000 With American Women.

Washington.—Discussion of French and American tariffs raises two questions of popular interest: What does Uncle Sam buy at France's notion counter, and what does France buy at America's general store?

"Given an unlimited checking account Uncle Sam could find for his masculine use few representative French products in an average large American city," says a bulletin from the Washington (D. C.) headquarters of the National Geographic society. "But Madam Columbia—what a buying orgy she could have! In one year France does a $157,000,000 business, chiefly with American women.

"First, an American woman shopping with an unlimited checking account would pick out Paris gowns of the latest mode, Paris hats and Paris shoes, Paris gloves and Paris handkerchiefs. At the perfumery counter a fragrant fluid that may cost many dollars an ounce, face powder, rouge, lipstick and eyebrow pencil—all the thousand items of the commerce of vanity. At another counter she would purchase a French hand bag and at still another, French pearls.

"Check book in hand let her enter a delicatessen. What an armful of French products awaits her there: French peas, French mushrooms, truffles, 'English' walnuts from Bordeaux, creamy Camembert cheese, smooth Gruyere cheese, green-veined Roquefort cheese, Brie cheese, Munster cheese from Hautes Vosges, pate de foie gras from Strasbourg or Toulouse, sardines from Brittany, French packed vegetables of all kinds, French sirups, French mineral waters, Vichy and the like (342,000 gallons in one year), narcissus and lily bulbs for table decoration, and garlic for seasoning from Tours.

"The shopper has not finished. Back at the yard goods department, the ribbon counter, the lace counter, the comb counter, the umbrella counter, and the thread and button counters she could spend and spend, buying the beautiful French creations, articles of the 'luxe' trade, as it is called in France.

Cotton Our Major French Export.

"The United States' exports to France, although double the value of imports, concentrate on a few products. To observe the products concealed behind the dollar sign of statistics it is necessary to visit New Orleans, the ports of Texas, Norfolk, Seattle, Chicago and New York. King Cotton reigns undisputed monarch of the American export trade to France, monopolizing almost one-half the total value which runs to $280,000,000. Texas sends petroleum products in addition to cotton; Montana, much copper; Chicago, wheat, lard and bacon; Seattle, condensed milk; New York, machinery, and Norfolk, two dissimilar fuels, coal and tobacco.

"The 124,000 dressmakers of Paris are not, curious to record, France's premier exporters to America. Paris has nothing to do with the republic's leading American-dollar catcher, the walnut. While the 'luxe' trade of Paris, apparel, perfumes, cosmetics and jewelry rolls up the largest collective total, the 'English' walnut, grown in southern France and exported from Bordeaux and Marseilles, individually leads the list with a value of $6,103,000 in one recent year. Six other leading exports to the United States, in order of their importance, are perfumery and cosmetics, unstrung pearls, silk-wearing apparel, cotton laces, gold and silver threads, braid, fabrics and laces, and leather gloves.

"Cargoes that leave Le Havre and Marseilles and Bordeaux wharfs today may be better packed in snug boxes than galleon cargoes of olden days, but their contents are no less worthy of some poet's praise. Beneath the decks trod by tourists home-coming from France, lie pungent crates: 93,000 pounds of geranium oil in one year, 18,917 pounds of attar of roses, 83,550 pounds of thyme, and 103,413 pounds of sweet lavendar.

Skunk Skins and Lard.

"Economically the United States still remains a raw colonial country as far as France is concerned. The United States supplies the raw materials for skilled French craftsmen who sell them back to us as artistic creations. Raw cotton goes from Texas to the looms of France and then as lace and dress goods recrosses the Atlantic ocean to New York. Lard shipped from Chicago to the Riviera is used to extract flower essences for perfumes which later sell on Michigan boulevard. Skunk skins to the value of over a million dollars go to France annually from the United States and return as apparel a la mode.

"Only in the realm of machinery does the United States market with France on the scale of an advanced civilization. To weave American cotton France buys American textile machinery and her dressmakers use American sewing machines. Her clerks write on American typewriters, and her printers work often on American printing presses. Fourteen per cent of France's imports come from the United States. We rank France thirteenth as an export market for American products and eighteenth as merchant of foreign goods sold in the United States."

Old Will Reveals Gigantic Patrimony

Kewanee, Ill.—Possibility of inheritance of a portion of a $500,000,000 estate of the late John Nicholas Emerich, New York, has aroused the interest of several of the 300 heirs residing in this vicinity. Emerich, a partner of the original John Jacob Astor of New York, who died 110 years ago, left an estate of $146,000,000 in a 90-year trust fund.

The Emerich heirs hope to establish their claim through an old will which Mrs. Edna Carnahan of Rollinsville, Colo., said she found in a chest in her home recently.

Workers Find Roman Relics in Brook Bed

Budapest, Hungary.—Workmen deepening a brook in the neighborhood of Sopron have come upon a large quantity of Roman relics. They comprise coins and weapons, such as swords, lances, spears and amphorae and other household articles. It was thought the long-sought for grave of Attila, the famous leader of the Huns, had been unearthed, as tradition has it that the chieftain's grave is somewhere in the neighborhood of the village of Agfalva in this region.

He Would Put Booths for Wooers in Churches

Denver, Colo.—Dr. Ira Landrith of Chicago, citizenship superintendent of the World's Christian Endeavor union, speaking at a rally of Denver Christian Endeavor societies, advocated courting booths in churches as a means of attracting young people to church.

'Why not?" he asked. "People get married in the church, so why couldn't they do their courting there?"

"It's a whole lot better that a young man should court his sweetheart in the church than in a dance hall or public park, where bootleggers and other evil influences are thicker than mosquitoes in Alaska. And the nice part about it is that in case the young couple suddenly decide to get married the preacher is generally handy."

Judge Hits 93,000 Laws in Year as U. S. Craze

Mobile, Ala.—America has gone crazy on lawmaking, declared Judge Robert S. Hall in his address to the grand jury at the opening of the Forrest County (Mississippi) Circuit court at Hattiesburg.

"There are at present 1,900,000 laws in the United States, of which 93,000 were placed on the statutes last year," stated the judge. The reason for the nonenforcement of so many laws is attributed by the judge to the fact that 75 per cent of the people do not want them enforced.

EASY LESSONS IN AUCTION BRIDGE

Author of "Highlights on Auction Bridge"

Article Nine.

Defensive Bids

AFTER dealer bids one no trump, second hand may:

(1) Overbid in a suit.
(2) Overbid with two no trump.
(3) Use the informatory double.

While these are not strictly defensive bids, it seems most logical to consider them at this point.

(1) It is seldom wise to bid two of a suit over one no trump. If the suit is a minor there could be practically no chance of assuming the offensive and making game. Moreover, the stronger such a minor suit is, the more formidable it would be against a no trump, while its value against any other suit as trump would be far less.

Suppose dealer bids a no trump and second hand holds a solid diamond suit with the four top honors and nothing else of value in his hand. If he bids 2 diamonds the dealer or his partner probably will bid a major and they might easily outbid second hand's diamonds. With a major suit as trump, diamonds probably would be trumped after the first round, thus producing but one trick. But if second hand passes and the no trump bid wins the declaration, these diamonds would surely take seven tricks, setting the no trump declaration. If, after second hand passes, third hand takes his partner's no trump out by a suit bid, second hand's diamonds may be bid on the next round.

The same is true of a major suit unless some outside strength offers a possibility of game, and the hand as a whole gives assurance that opponents could not go game by shifting to any other suit.

Examples of second hand holdings after dealer has bid one no trump and what should be done:

(1) S—x x; H—x x x; D—A, K, Q, J, x x; C—x x. Pass.

(2) —A, K, Q, x x; H—x x x; D—x x x; C—x x. Pass.

(3) S—A, K, Q, x x; H—x x x; D—K, Q, x; C—K x. Bid 2 spades.

(2) It sometimes happens that dealer bids one no trump when second hand had made up his mind to make that bid, and in such a case many players are puzzled to know what to do.

There are two methods of procedure: Second hand may bid two no trump, or he may double informatorily dealer's one no trump.

If second hand holds seven or eight probable tricks, largely in the minor suits, he should not hesitate to bid two no trump because a game seems probable and that would be worth much more than the penalty he might win by allowing dealer to play the hand.

(3) If, however, he has just a moderate no trump bid, his best play is to double and let his partner choose a trump suit with the common understanding that a four-card major should be bid rather than a five-card minor. The requirements for such a double are two and one-half to three quick tricks, depending upon distribution and intermediate cards called "fillers." Doubler's hand should be such that he would be satisfied with a bid of either major from his partner, or he should have strength enough to allow him to overbid on the next round if partner's strong suit should be his weak one. For instance, if the doubler holds S—A, J, x x; H—K, Q, x x; D—A, x x; C—x x; and partner bids two clubs, second hand would go to two no trump on the next round of bidding. But if partner named either major or diamonds, second hand would be satisfied.

Other examples of second hand holdings when dealer has bid one no trump:

(1) S—K, J, x; H—A, J, x x; D—x x; C—K, Q, J, x. Double.

(2) S—A, Q, x x; H—x x; D—A, K, J, x x; C—K, x. Double.

(3) S—A, x x; H—A, x x; D—x x x; C—A, x x x. Pass.

(4) S—x x x; H—K, x x; D—A, K, x x; C—A, x x. Pass.

In No. 1 if partner bids diamonds, second hand would bid no trump; and in No. 2, if the response is in hearts, second hand would do the same. No. 3 has three quick tricks but lacks fillers. No. 4 has three and a half quick tricks but is so weak in the majors that it should be passed.

Health Dependent on One's Normal Weight

For the sake of health, everyone should strive to maintain the normal weight for his height and age, to be neither too fat nor too thin, declares Ethel Somers, dietetic expert, in an article in Liberty.

"If one eats a great variety of foods in quantities sufficient to maintain normal body weight," Miss Somers explains, "the diet is usually a satisfactory one. Every pound of body weight is known to be the equivalent of 4,000 stored calories, yet counting calories is no longer considered essential reckoning in the program of getting fat or thin.

"A liberal and persistent daily use of simple foods which do not upset digestion is the best way to put on weight," the writer continues. "Out-of-door activity, limited exercises, warm clothing and change of health habits, especially sleeping habits, will help in the struggle which in time will meet with success. Adding avoirdupois necessarily means eating regularly more than one needs."

Flapper's Clock

"We have all heard of the old-fashioned woman who sang one or more verses of 'Nearer, My God to Thee,' to determine the exact moment when the boiled eggs were properly done," writes Pansy of Urbana, "but it remained for a modern flapper to give us a brand-new and practical idea on the subject.

"Recently married, she was being 'razzed' about her inability to cook, and her brother remarked: 'Why, she can't even boil eggs!'

"'I can, too,' she said. 'I smoke one cigarette for soft, two for medium and three for hard-boiled!'"—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Family Secret

Some one asked little Barbara Stern, daughter of the Big U's business manager, the meaning of the quotation, "For men must work and women must weep."

The little girl thought it over for a moment and replied: "It means that the poor man has to work all day and get the money and then his wife has to cry all night and get it away from him. "But," she added as an afterthought, "my daddy isn't like that."

Sculpin Had Traveled

When Joe Clukey, a Rockland (Maine) sailor, pulled a sculpin out of Rockland harbor, he found he had caught a fish with a history. Firmly embedded in the fish's tail was a piece of rusty wire and attached to the wire was a small water-soaked piece of wood on which was carved: "A. K., June 19, 1919, Northeast harbor, Me." If the specimen in question followed the shore line from Northeast harbor to Rockland, it swam about 100 miles.

New Gold Strike in the Piute Mountains

Gold that promises to develop into the West's richest strike in recent years has been discovered in the Piute mountains, 260 miles east of Los Angeles. The discoverer of the ledge is Henry Muhleisen (left), and associated with Muhleisen are Miss R. M. Martin, a Los Angeles stenographer, and a group of men from Harrold, S. D. Assays taken from the discovery shaft show a gold content in quartz ranging from $179 to $800 a ton.

AUSTRIAN GIRLS DISCARD SKIRTS AND PETTICOATS

Petition Police for Government Authority to Wear Garb of Sterner Sex.

Vienna, Austria.—Vienna's women are discarding skirts and petticoats as cumbersome and impracticable. They have petitioned the police for governmental authority to wear trousers and other masculine garb.

The most of the petitioners are industrial workers, who believe the male costume will enable them to perform their work more easily.

But not a few are smart society women, who, tired of the tyranny of the skirt and petticoat, want to differentiate themselves from their sisters who are still "slaves" to fashion.

Fearing if they wore male attire without official authority they might be molested in the streets, the petitioners sought printed license cards from the authorities. But the government declined their request, saying there was no need of legalizing something which was not forbidden.

It was even pointed out that men are free to wear skirts and petticoats. But if such a thing caused a public scandal it would be forbidden. So far no Austrian men have essayed this innovation.

But girls up to fifteen years of age in Austria now wear boy's "pants," socks and masculine shirts.

Picture hats, toques, turbans and other elaborate headgear have long since disappeared. Many of the women are wearing simple masculine caps and tam o' shanters. A great majority, who belong to outdoor "cults," wear neither head covering nor stockings.

Since the revolution in Austria everybody is free to do anything that is not specifically enjoined in the statute. In the days of the old empire it was quite the reverse; everything was prohibited unless it was specially sanctioned by the law.

"Hungry Hank," Rooster, Figures in Fair Contest

Berlin, Wis.—It was a great day for "Hungry Hank," who was a big feature attraction at the Junior Agricultural fair held here recently. "Hungry Hank" is a rooster with a big appetite, from the farm of E. M. Fitzmaurice, south of Berlin.

"Hank" was the center of a wild guessing contest. A prize was offered to the man, woman or child who could guess the exact number of kernels of corn that the bird would eat in a given time.

Mrs. Archie Davis and Mrs. William Samzow tied for first place with guesses of 250 kernels, for "Hank" got away with exactly 249 of the dainty morsels. Second prize went to Mrs. Reuben Peterson with a guess of 247 kernels. Two judges stood by and "counted" while "Hungry Hank" feasted.

Reserve Power Kept on Hand in Sweden

It is of course the usual thing for a city to have a few reserve reservoirs to guard against interruption of the water supply, but a Swedish city has extended the principle, having constructed two steam reservoirs. These are two large iron tanks, holding a reserve supply of stream for the city's hydro-electric plant. Enough is held here to operate the generators an hour or more.

The tanks are filled to within 90 per cent of their capacity with water raised to a temperature considerably above what its boiling point would be in the open air. When steam is drawn off more is instantly available. A relatively small boiler is sufficient to keep the accumulators charged and ready for service. The insulation is such that heat losses are negligible even in low temperatures outdoors. Automatic valves keep the pressure in the tanks constant.

50c Per Pound for TURKEYS

That's what we are getting for No. 1 cold storage Young Toms now. Fresh turkeys would bring a considerably higher price.

Note this: Thanksgiving turkey prices will be high—likely the highest in years.

1st—The 1927 turkey crop generally is several weeks late.
2nd—Because Thanksgiving comes nearly a week earlier than usual and 3rd—Times are exceptionally good—beef and all other meats are high—so the average housewife will buy turkey this Thanksgiving. She can afford it and will insist upon having turkey.

You Can't Do the Impossible

You know as well as we do that only a small portion of crop will be fit to market Thanksgiving. The majority won't be big enough or fat enough—but notwithstanding this we know that every grower will have some fancy turkeys and these he should dress and ship direct to us.

WHY TO US?—FOR THESE REASONS:

1st—We are specialists in turkey marketing—we advertise and sell turkeys every day in the year and we have been in the poultry business over 30 years. Moreover, we are the strongest firm financially in this line of business.
2nd—We are the only firm that spends thousands of dollars in advertising turkeys to the consumer—we advertise them under our "DE LUXE BRAND." Many dealers refuse to buy any other turkey because their customers demand "DE LUXE BRAND." Others may handle equal quality but the public don't know it. It's therefore that we usually get more orders than most of our local competitors combined.

That's Your Advantage

We have the orders—and that's why we pay such big prices, AND MAKE YOU A GUARANTEE. You may not have shipped us before and you may only have a half dozen or so of prime birds for Thanksgiving or you may have a large lot—whatever the quantity—we need them and we guarantee you high prices—we guarantee to pay you the top market (or better) on day of arrival for kind and grade less 5% and express.

You can and will make the most money SHIPPING US direct Thanksgiving.

Don't wait—decide now—Write and ship us direct. That's the road to success.

"Do you think she's with him?"

Before he could answer, the telephone bell rang sharply, and the quickness with which he turned and snatched the receiver off the hook betrayed the tension of excitement under which he was laboring.

"Been looking for me!" he exclaimed. "A man named Mallory! Well, why didn't you try these apartments sooner? Where is he now?"

* * * * * * * *

"All right. Don't waste any more time."

"That you, Mallory?"

* * * * * * * *

"What's that you say? You've got the girl. Came back to her room, did she?"

* * * * * * * *

"What's she like? Violent at all?"

* * * * * * * *

"Well, wait a minute. Hold the wire. I'll tell you what to do with her."

He turned round then, and began speaking rapidly to Doctor McAlister.

"The girl went to her room and Mallory has got her. He says she's perfectly quiet, not violent at all, that is, but she's taking on a great deal, protesting that her arrest must be a mistake. So it's clear she hasn't gone off into one of those subjective states of hers. But what are we to do with her? Do you suppose she'd be of service to us in getting track of Wilkins? She'd probably take pretty good care not to get him into trouble, I suppose, if she suspected that we really wanted him."

"Tell him to bring her here," said my chief, his eyes shining with excitement. "We shall be able to use her, never fear. Yes, have Mallory bring her to this room."

Ashton hesitated for an instant. Then transmitted the message, word for word, to Mallory, and hung up the receiver.

"I don't quite see it," he went on thoughtfully. "Unless Wilkins took her into his confidence, she won't know anything about him. If he did, she'll be on her guard not to betray him, and a stupid, stubborn person like that sometimes makes a lot of trouble."

The doctor's only reply was a comment, which sounded a little irrelevant.

"I told you, didn't I," said he, "that in her subjective states her whole system of sensory nerves seems to be abnormally stimulated, almost to a hysterical degree?"

I had it on my tongue to ask him what he meant, when the sound of footsteps approaching along the corridor, cut the question short. The next moment there was a tap on the door, the detective, Mallory, ushered Jane Perkins back into our sitting room.

"Here she is," he said briefly "Do you want me?"

"Yes," said the doctor; "sit down. You sit down, too, Perkins; here in the easy chair where you were before. No, my poor child, there's nothing to be frightened about. Don't cry. We're not going to hurt you."

The perfect poise and balance of his own nerves gave him a tremendous power of calming the nerves and quieting the fears of others. That single sentence, spoken in his calm resonant voice did more to reassure the girl than I could have done in an hour.

"Now you're not afraid any more, Jane," he went on. "This little mirror, swinging so, makes you calm again, even makes you sleepy. You're going to sleep already. Your eyelids are heavy. Your hands are heavy, too, and quite relaxed, just as they are when you go to sleep. You're asleep now; fast asleep."

Once more, and only once, the doctor hummed the strange, droning tune of the death chant, and I saw, by the little shiver that went over the girl's body, that the transformation of her personality had already taken place.

"Watch," said I to Ashton, "watch the girl's face."

"You've been showing me wonders tonight," he said in a voice that was dulled with amazed bewilderment, "but this is a wonder that out-tops them all."

All that was true, for there, under his eyes, he saw, reappearing in the body of this English chambermaid, the strange wild creature he had gone with us to St. Martin's hospital to see, a couple of nights before.

The doctor's voice broke the silence. He spoke to the girl, a single, short sentence in what I now recognized to be the Maori tongue. Then, without a pause, he went on:

"I am speaking in English now, Fanenna, and you understand me. Tell me that it is so."

Her answer was a sort of clinking guttural, impossible one would think for a Western throat to produce.

"Say it in English," the doctor commanded.

"Ee—es," she said.

The doctor turned to the detective. "Mallory," he said, "you know where Wilkins' room in the hotel is, don't you?"

"Yes, sir, but it's locked. He's gone off with the key."

"Don't waste time trying to find another key," said the doctor. "Break the door down and leave it so that we can walk directly in. Then go to this girl's room, find some warm wraps, a hat and a cloak and a pair of overshoes. Then get your own hat and overcoat and come back here."

Mallory hesitated, and cast an inquiring glance toward Ashton.

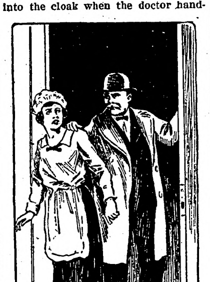
"Oh, yes," said Ashton with a laugh. "He's the boss now. You'll take all your orders from him."

The doctor smiled. "I think you'll want your overcoat yourself, and let me recommend a cap, if you have such a thing, rather than a derby. There's no telling how long we'll be out, and the air is cold tonight with all this half-frozen dampness in it."

While the other two men went on their several errands, Doctor McAlister and I found our ulsters and caps. The doctor added to his equipment a heavy walking stick and a huge pair of what he called galoshes.

Ashton was ready as soon as we were, and Mallory didn't keep us waiting more than two or three minutes. He was dressed for the expedition himself, and he had over his arm the green cloak, and in his hand carried a rather preposterous hat, which was just about the sort of piece of millinery one might expect Jane Perkins' taste for adornments of this sort to result in.

The girl got up and huddled herself into the cloak when the doctor handed it to her, in a perfectly natural sort of way, as if it was a garment with which she was well acquainted.



"Here She Is," He Said Briefly. "Do You Want Me?"

"All ready," asked the doctor. "Then let's be off. Mallory, you show us the way. We want to go to Wilkins' room first."

"All of us?" questioned Ashton. "The girl, too?"

"Yes," said the doctor. "She's the important member of this expedition."

I caught then, and it made my flesh creep a little, my first inkling of his purpose. But it was perfectly evident from Ashton's face that no such idea had occurred to him.

"Hadn't she better be handcuffed to Mallory?" he asked, as we were leaving the room. "She might give us the slip."

"No," said the doctor; "she'll follow —follow like a dog."

We threaded our way in silence through the corridors to Wilkins' room. It was a small room, and I stayed back in the corridor with Mallory to make room for my chief and Ashton to go in with the girl.

What I saw through the doorway was curious and interesting. Doctor McAlister strode straight across to the wardrobe, flung open the door of it, groped for a moment in its interior, with one hand, then withdrew it, waving triumphantly, an old shoe.

And now Ashton's eyes lighted up with the surmise which had come to me a few moments earlier.

"Good God, McAlister!" he exclaimed. "What are you going to do?"

"I'm going to find Josiah Haines, alias Wilkins, if he hasn't got too long a start on us."

As he finished speaking, he ostentatiously sniffed at the shoe himself, and held it out to the girl.

"Osa Enns," she said.

"Exactly," said the doctor; "Josiah Haines."

"You can't possibly mean," exclaimed Ashton, "that you're going to try to track him with her, as if—as if she were a hound! It's impossible. Impossible and horrible, too," he added with a shiver.

"So far as the horror is concerned," said the doctor, "we can't afford to be squeamish, with telephone and telegraph wires down all over the city, and likely enough trolley wires, too. He has too great an advantage of us to warrant our rejecting any means of finding him that come to hand, even though they are primitive. As for its being impossible, that's exactly the thing we're going to test. I don't believe it is. The girl scented us half way across Morgan's study, and 'pointed' us, exactly as a setter points a quail. And she confessed to me that she identified the man she murdered by his odor."

Without waiting for any reply, he turned abruptly to the girl and spoke to her in Maori, asking her a question, if one could judge from the odd inflection of the thick, guttural words. In her eyes already there was a kind of smoldering fire. The doctor cried out something more in Maori, and accompanied the exclamation with a gesture of both hands toward the doorway.

The girl darted out between Mallory and me, like some wild beast unleashed, and set out down the corridor at a slow, swinging trot, her head bent low and swaying sideways. It was uncanny to see her. I felt my flesh creep as I set out to follow her.

Mallory had not understood, and he made a motion to detain her, but this was checked by a pre-emptory order from Ashton.

"Follow along!" cried the doctor. "Keep as close as you can. We mustn't lose sight of her!"

We had lost sight of her already, for she had turned to the right into a cross corridor. When we reached the corner where she had turned, we all halted, as if some medusa hand had suddenly turned us to stone.

The Meredith is a high building. We were on the eighth floor, but the girl was in the act of getting out of a window. Mallory recovered the use of his muscles first, and rushed forward in an attempt to forestall what seemed to him a deliberate attempt at suicide.

"Hold on!" cried the doctor. "She's only going where Wilkins went. If there was a way down there for him, she'll be able to follow him safely."

"And wherever they can go," said Ashton, "I guess we can follow."

He started down the corridor as he spoke. I should probably have agreed with him, had I not become aware just then that the door beside which I was standing opened into the elevator shaft, and the gauge showed that the elevator was descending. I signaled it to stop, on the chance that it might prove useful.

By that time Ashton had already joined Mallory at the window. Apparently one glance was all they needed, for they came hurrying back with white faces.

"She has worked herself along a six-inch ledge," said the lawyer, "to an iron standpipe. It's not conceivable that Wilkins went that way."

"Don't forget that he was Bully Franklin's first mate," said the doctor. "But this is a better way for us. Come along."

We all four piled into the elevator and told the boy to drop us, as quickly as he could, right through to the basement. The excitement in our faces was imperative. He threw the lever over and let us down at a tremendous rate.

"This way," cried Mallory, rushing off in the dark.

We lost sight of him, but heard sounds of a struggle he was having with a badly warped door which evidently had not been opened in a long time. He conquered it just as we came up with him, and the next moment, peering out in the misty gray light to see whether we had taken the right direction after all, we made out a dark blurred figure, which was, nevertheless, unmistakable. Still in that crouching attitude, with bowed head swaying from side to side, the girl was working round in widening circles, trying to catch the scent.

Presently she caught what she had been searching for, straightened up a little out of her crouching attitude, and set out, briskly, at a gait which was neither precisely a walk nor a run, but which, if she should keep it up, would tax our powers to follow.

She threaded her way down a three-foot paved passage, which led out of the court and into a larger one, crossed this and vaulted over a low brick wall into the alley which bisected the block behind The Meredith. She trotted the length of this, with us straggling along behind her as best we could, crossed the boulevard, without a glance to right or left, and went straight on down the alley and through the next block.

"You see," commented the doctor, "he took elaborate precautions against being recognized in the immediate neighborhood of The Meredith. Almost every guest at the hotel, as well as the full force of servants, know him. But his chance of encountering any such person diminishes rapidly as he gets away from the vicinity of the hotel. He'll leave the alley to take to the streets presently."

Scott's First Novel

"Waverly" was the first of the series of famous novels written by Sir Walter Scott, produced in 1814. The secret of the authorship was well kept for years. The book gives a fine picture of the hopes and fears that animated political parties in Great Britain in 1745, the year of the uprising led by Charles Stuart, the Young Pretender. Its name is taken from Waverly, near Hindhead, in Surrey, England.

They Are Not Afraid

The robins and wrens, the bluebirds and nuthatchers, like all birds, are not really timid, according to Nature Magazine. They will accustom themselves to anything as soon as they know that no harm will come to them.

Buried $6,000, Dies With Secret Untold

Blytheville, Ark.—T. G. Wilson has carried with him to his grave the secret of the hiding place of the $6,000 he had saved. When the bank of Blytheville failed in 1920, Wilson had about $10,000 deposited in the institution, it is said. He began to save anew but refused to have anything to do with banks.

He later received a portion of his savings from the defunct bank. This money, with the additional savings, he showed to his wife, telling her that he was going to put it where no one could steal it. That was three years ago. Recently his mind became affected and he gave varied versions of his disposal of the sum.

As death neared he attempted to reveal the hiding place of the money to his wife, but only the word "buried" could be distinguished. Since his death the relatives have continued the search, started when he was still alive, for the money.

FIREMEN HEROES ACCUSED OF ARSON

Say They Started Blaze in Real Estate Office.

Mineola, L. I.—Philip Nofi and Michael Golanski, who are members of Protection Hose company of Port Washington, and Samuel Marcling, a taxicab driver, were held without bail recently by Egbert L'Ecluse, justice of the peace, charged with arson in the third degree.

Nofi and Golanski are taxicab drivers as well as volunteer firemen, but were unable to find sufficient outlet for their exuberant heroism. Half a dozen times a week they were in the mood for mad rescues, for swinging from one volcanic window to another on scaling ladders, for battering their way to the heart of a roaring fire.

But fires were few in Port Washington, and Nofi and Golanski chafed in melancholy desuetude until, according to Seward Spoor, assistant district attorney, with the help of Marcling they kindled a quite satisfactory fire in the office of the Daniels Real Estate Development company, between Port Washington and Sands Point.

Nofi and Golanski were among the first firemen to arrive. They toiled with unremitting valor and determination, covering themselves and Protection Hose company with glory. On all sides resounded commendation for Nofi and Golanski. Their arrest later was both a shock and a source of embarrassment to the Protection Hose company.

Two years ago six volunteer firemen of Rockville Center were found guilty of setting fires in order to distinguish themselves.

Proud Indian Lived in Poverty Amid Riches

Little Neck, L. I.—Wild Pigeon, sachem of the Montauk and Narragansett Indians, died in a dilapidated shack in Little Neck on the land which he had defended so vigorously from encroachments of the white man.

The physician who signed the death certificate said the fifty-one-year-old chieftain succumbed to heart disease. Those who knew him, however, believe chagrin over his losing fight to preserve the ancient burial ground of his people contributed to his death.

For nearly three centuries members of his tribe lay buried in a little plot surrounding his house at Little Neck.

Last year the city proposed to widen a boulevard in such manner that the graves would be covered with pavement. Wild Pigeon protested. In the courts the city won. Wild Pigeon watched, helpless. He had to stop his work in the general post office at Manhattan, and his health failed steadily until the end.

Widening of the boulevard made the Indian's land, already valuable, worth more than $200,000. But he indignantly refused to consider its sale.

Newlyweds Drowned in Honeymoon Auto

Portage, Wis.—Death's hand interrupted a honeymoon shortly after the wedding bells had ceased to ring.

With old shoes dangling on their car, the bodies of Mr. and Mrs. John J. Pirkl of Marshall, Wis., were taken from a pond in the Portage city park recently. The bridegroom's hand clutched the wheel of his automobile and his bride of a few hours had her arm about him.

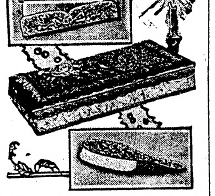
In the fog and rain of the night Pirkl apparently missed the turn after crossing the Wisconsin river bridge at Portage and the automobile plunged over a 15-foot embankment. It landed upright in the pond and the water just reached the top of the car.

Madman Slays Son

Los Angeles.—Overcome with a "mad desire" to slay his child, Matt Minarich, forty-six, admitted he had strangled his eleven-year-old son, John. After the killing, Minarich called neighbors and led them to an arroyo where he had thrown the body.

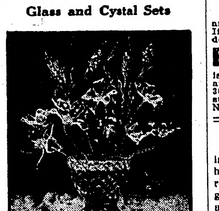
What to Give at Christmas Time

Ornate Dresser Things



Ideal for gift occasions are exquisite articles which show French inspiration in their elaborate finishings of gold lace and satin garlanded with flowers of superb silks and ribbons, all displaying a superior handcraft. Christmas will be a time for rejoicing for the debutante or bride who receives anything so beautiful as the dresser utility box shown in this picture, covered with taffeta silk veiled with all-over gold lace, garnitured with a cluster of handmade taffeta roses. The comb case and top of brush are made to match.

Glass and Cystal Sets

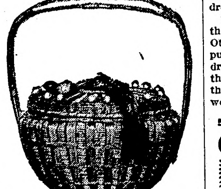


Glass flowers strike a most modern note in smart decoration. Transparent, luminous, lovely are these flowers made all of glass even to their slender stems. Only in the most exclusive shops are they to be found, which is directly in their favor if you are seeking a gift for some fastidious friend. Not only flowers, but exotic birds whose plumage is a solid setting of glittering glass jewels, and who are posed on sparkling crystal mounts, are among these decorative elegancies.

Gifts for Baby Dear

When it comes to "the dear little dimpled darling 'who' has ne'er seen Christmas yet," Santa Claus is simply lavish in his giving. "Something different" from the regulation silk or kidskin bound baby book are those which specialty shops are featuring of white pique with an applique of wee satin roses. The ribbon carriage strap and coverlid clamps, which complete this baby set, are made of satin flowers.

Baskets Make Nice Gifts



There's a lure in cunningly shaped baskets which no "homey" woman can resist. What's more, the modern interior decorator lays great stress on the ornamental qualities of the fanciful basket. In the shops one sees, this season, a more-than-ever fascinating array of baskets which are awaiting to have Christmas greeting cards tied to their handles. A basket like the one in the picture is roomy enough to hold one's knitting or "pick-up" embroidery and as to socks to be darned, "it covers a multitude of sins" of this sort.

WOMEN OF MIDDLE AGE

Praise Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Mrs. Annie Kwinski of 526 1st Avenue, Milwaukee, Wis., writes that she became so weak and run-down that she was not able to do her housework. She saw the name Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound in the paper and said to her husband, "I will try that medicine and see if it will help me." She says she took six bottles and is feeling much better.

Mrs. Mattie Adams, who lives in Downing Street, Brewton, Ala., writes as follows: "A friend recommended Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and since taking it I feel like a different woman."

With her children grown up, the middle-aged woman finds time to do the things she never had time to do before—read the new books, see the new plays, enjoy her grand-children, take an active part in church and civic affairs. Far from being pushed aside by the younger set, she finds a full, rich life of her own. That is, if her health is good.

Thousands of women past fifty, say they owe their vigor and health to Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and are recommending it to their friends and neighbors.

Coughs and Colds are not only annoying, but dangerous. If not attended to at once they may develop into serious ailment.

Boschee's Syrup is soothing and healing in such cases, and has been used for sixty-one years. 30c and 90c bottles. Buy it at your drug store. G. G. Green, Inc., Woodbury, N. J.

On a Bus Top

Although the story got around a lot last week—and two people say they heard it years ago anyhow—we will report that two business men of the garment industry were overheard in animated conversation on a bus top. Finally one of them paused and demanded: "Well, what do you think of my proposition?"

"I'll tell you in two words," said his associate. "Impossible."—The New Yorker.

The BABY

Why do so many, many babies of today escape all the little fretful spells and infantile ailments that used to worry mothers through the day, and keep them up half the night?

If you don't know the answer, you haven't discovered pure, harmless Castoria. It is sweet to the taste, and sweet in the little stomach. And its gentle influence seems felt all through the tiny system. Not even a distasteful dose of castor oil does so much good.

Fletcher's Castoria is purely vegetable, so you may give it freely, at first sign of colic; or constipation; or diarrhea. Or those many times when you just don't know what is the matter. For real sickness, call the doctor, always. At other times, a few drops of Fletcher's Castoria.

The doctor often tells you to do just that; and always says Fletcher's. Other preparations may be just as pure, just as free from dangerous drugs, but why experiment? Besides, the book on care and feeding of babies that comes with Fletcher's Castoria is worth its weight in gold!

MEMORY'S CHILDREN

By DOUGLAS MALLOCH

WHEN they grow up, the girls, the boys,
And leave us just remembered joys,
No more a voice upon the stair
But only an old echo there,
When they grow up, and far they roam,
Or build another house and home,
Heart-hungry, often we complain;
For all our toil where is our gain?

Well, much we gained. Though only these
We have, we have the memories;
And what makes lovely, lovely age
Is written on some other page,
Some earlier record. Youth must look
Ahead for joy. But age's book
Is filled with pictures of the past
That give us pleasure to the last.

Though children gave us nothing more,
They left within our hearts a store
Of childish prattle, many a kiss
That now perhaps we sadly miss
Yet still we have. However far
This very night our children are,
I'm sure that many treasures stay
That time can never take away.

That is our gain. When they grow up
They leave some joy within the cup
The man may hie him over hills
The woman wander where she wills,
But from the cradle of our hearts
No baby ever quite departs.
We have the buds who lose the flow'rs:
Our children still are always ours.

TURKEY TALK

"AT THIS time of the year," said Grandfather Turkey, "I like to talk to all the turkeys in the barnyard."

"Gobble, gobble, gobble," said the other turkeys. "Do talk to us, Grandfather Turkey."

"Yes, talk to us," said Teddy Turkey. "Tell us anything at all. We're well fed and we feel like a little rest.

"We don't feel like wandering or adventuring."

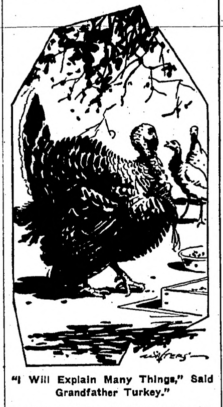
"No," said Grandfather Turkey, "of course not."

"Why do you say 'Of course not'?" asked Teddy Turkey.

"Ah, you are but a young turkey. You do not understand," said Grandfather Turkey.

"Won't you explain it to me?" asked Teddy Turkey.

Now Grandfather Turkey was much pleased when Teddy Turkey asked to have Grandfather Turkey explain his speech. There was nothing Grandfather Turkey enjoyed more than explaining and talking and strutting and gobbling.



"I Will Explain Many Things," Said Grandfather Turkey."

"Yes, I will explain many things," said Grandfather Turkey, "and I will do so as soon as you all gather about me."

So all the turkeys gathered about Grandfather Turkey and he began to tell them of many things.

"First I have a little news of the barnyard to tell," said Grandfather Turkey. "Jackie, the horse, is devoted to the little girl who is the daughter of the farmer.

"Whenever Jackie hears her footsteps he begins to neigh. Yes, he knows her by her footsteps and doesn't wait until he sees her.

"Then he kisses her when she comes to see him and she kisses him, too.

"Oh, they are the best of friends, and it is very sweet the way Jackie neighs when he hears her in the distance.

"Then there is one other thing I wish to say before I begin to tell some Turkey news.

"That is that horseradish is an herb and people grate it and then put vinegar on it and eat it.

"I don't know why it is called horseradish, Turkey children, but I do know that horses don't eat it. I have heard that one of the reasons it has been called horseradish is because it is so strong an herb and horses are supposed to be so strong.

"I heard one of the Turkey children saying the other day that it must be a radish vegetable for a horse!

"It is in the spring when people eat it, mostly. How did you happen to hear of it?"

And Grandfather Turkey spoke to the Turkey child whom he had heard speak of horseradish a little time before.

"I heard the farmer's daughter telling another little girl how much she liked it and then I wondered if it could be that she enjoyed hay and oats and other food for horses!"

"Gobble, gobble, gobble," laughed Grandfather Turkey.

"Well, now I must tell you Turkey truths.

"The reason you do not want to wander away and adventure forth these days is because you are being so well fed for either Thanksgiving Day or Christmas Day.

"Then you will be eaten, without a doubt, or, at least, very likely.

"But to make up for that kind of an ending you are given so much food before that time to fatten you up (which is very pleasant) you do not care to go away.

"It would be very foolish if you did!

"I must tell you a little Turkey history, too.

"Our ancestors, or those Turkeys who came before us, were from Europe, then they went to Mexico, and then they became domestic turkeys and now are thoroughly American.

"But our wild turkeys of this country are not our nearest relatives and they're not the ones from whom we art descended.

"Oh, we have our own history. Let no one think as they see us gobbling and strutting in the barnyard that we have no history.

"For we have—history and geography, too—for our ancestors have traveled, and it is interesting to know that, too.

"Ah yes, gobble, gobble, those of our family who finally end up on a platter have had a history back of them, at any rate!"

SAUCES FOR FISH, MEAT

A FISH, though well cooked and attractively served, is to the average person without appeal, unless accompanied by a good sauce. The garnishing, too, has a great value.

To serve with broiled fish try:

Cucumber Sauce.

Grate fresh-peeled cucumber and drain off most of the liquid, add salt, vinegar, a little onion juice and red pepper. Another is prepared by adding one-half cupful of whipped cream, the grated cucumber, salt and cayenne and vinegar to taste.

Sauce Tyrolienne.

To three-fourths of a cupful of mayonnaise add one-half tablespoonful of finely chopped capers and the same of parsley, one finely chopped gherkin, and one-half can of tomatoes stewed and strained and cooked down to two tablespoonfuls. Serve with fried fish.

Egg Charlotte.

Soak one and one-half tablespoonfuls of gelatin in one-third of a cupful of cold water, dissolve in one-third of a cupful of boiling water, add one cupful of sugar, three tablespoonfuls of lemon juice and one cupful of orange juice and pulp. Chill in ice water, when thick beat with a whisk until frothy, then add the whites beaten stiff and two cupfuls of whipped cream. Mold and chill.

Oyster Sauce.

Heat one pint of oysters until plump, using their own liquor. Remove the oysters and prepare the sauce, using one-fourth of a cupful of flour, one-fourth cupful of butter melted and well mixed, then add one cupful of chicken broth or milk and the oyster liquor. Cook until smooth, add the oysters and serve with fish or on toast as a luncheon or supper dish.

SOMETHING TO THINK ABOUT

By F. A. WALKER

WHAT IS SLEEP?

THE health department of New York some time ago reported a rate of four new cases a day of the mysterious malady known as sleeping sickness.

The patient goes to sleep and remains dormant for days or weeks, some of them never awakening, others waking for a few minutes and immediately relapsing into coma.

The disease, when it first made its appearance, was supposed to be a result of influenza. Later, cases have developed when there has been no influenza.

No treatment seems to be effective in accomplishing a cure, the only procedure being to sustain the strength of the patient by nourishing feeding and waiting for nature to overcome the strange attack.

Sleep, natural or unnatural, has been a scientific mystery ever since the first human lay down to rest and, closing his eyes, lapsed into unconsciousness.

We go to sleep by degrees. One by one the senses become inactive.

The first sense to disappear is sight. We eliminate that by closing our eyes.

After sight goes taste, smell and touch and when those four have become dormant we are sound asleep.

The sense of hearing never entirely stops. It is the sentinel sense, duller in action than when we are awake, that stays on the job while the others are resting.

When we are asleep we are in a condition next door to death. Only the administration of an anesthetic brings us nearer to the condition of lifelessness.

Some people and some animals sleep very deeply and soundly. With them the unknown sense which awakens us from sleep seems to be less keen and active.

Some people require, or think they require much sleep, others do with very little. Some of the lower forms of life are said not to sleep at all.

The ant, one of the most continuously active of all living organisms, has never been found asleep. It will work without cessation for periods as long as 12 hours and then, after a short rest but without sleep, it begins again its feverish activity.

Is there some possible way by which man could go without sleep? If there is no one has ever discovered it.

Soldiers in the war were carried to the limit of endurance without sleep and marched when the motions of the limbs were practically automatic.

It is impossible to overcome, by any means now known, the demand of the senses for rest and no effort of will-power can conquer it.

The study of the sleeping sickness disease may lead to a better understanding of sleep and more thorough knowledge of what really causes the semi-consciousness to which we gladly submit ourselves daily.

We may find out the source and reason for dreams, the value of which as a basis for reasoning has been in question ever since in Bible times Joseph incurred the hatred of his brethren by reciting to them what he had seen in his sleep.

We have much to learn about even so common and universal a thing as sleep. The study of the sleeping sickness may solve some of its mysteries.

THE WHY of SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

BACKWARD, FORWARD

THIS is for young ladies still unmarried. Go upstairs backward, into your chamber backward and get into bed backward. Drink some salt and water and if you dream of some one bringing you a drink of water it will be your future husband. This superstition is quite general in the United States and Canada.

The principal feature of this superstition is the backward movement enjoined. To put one's self in harmony with the world of spirits it is essential to reverse the order proper for the world of the flesh. William Wells Newell, in his introduction to Mrs. Bergen's collection of Current Superstitions, says of superstitions similar to the one under consideration: "There seem to be indications showing an original association of some of these usages with the lower world; such may be the significance of the backward movement. In order to put one's self in connection with the world of darkness it is necessary to reverse the procedure proper for the world of light. This principle, appearing in medieval magic, could also be illustrated from savage custom." But the principle of going backward, the principle of the reverse order, in magic antedates the Middle ages and its existence among savage tribes would indicate that it was of primitive origin. And it is not necessarily the "powers of darkness" with which connection is established by the backward movement—though in medieval magic such was generally the object; but with the world of spirits generally. The reverse ritual might be called a phase of sympathetic magic, that ruling idea in primitive man's philosophy.

The steadily increasing demand for cork for use as insulation in refrigerators draws heavily upon Spain and Portugal, the leading producers. Algeria and Tunis rank second in production, and France and Italy third. Cork is stripped from trees, the first crop coming in the trees' twentieth year, and the better quality between the fortieth and one hundredth years. Yields vary from 50 to 500 pounds a tree, which may live several hundred years.

For Meditation

By LEONARD A. BARRETT

THE RADII OF A CIRCLE

DISAGREEMENTS and disputes are due not so much to malice and selfishness as to misunderstanding. One of the easiest things in the world is for one person to misunderstand the motives and purposes of another. Disagreements are the more easily solved when two persons dispassionately meet together for the purpose of discussing the disputed point from the viewpoint of each other. Failure to do this has led to many a tragedy and broken friendship.

All the radii of a circle meet at the center. The spokes of a wheel meet at the hub. The more distant the spokes are from the hub, the farther are they apart. The nearer they get to the center the nearer do they get to each other. The best place to solve a problem is at the center of the radii of the different points of view.

The attitude of not respecting what the other person thinks is a very dangerous philosophy of life. Every person has the right to his own opinion and the right to express it cannot be denied. It is when people get together that good is accomplished. A house divided against itself cannot stand. A chain is no stronger than its weakest link. Your enemy may become your best friend when once you thoroughly understand each other.

If I knew you and you knew me,
If both of us could clearly see,
And with an inner sight divine
The meaning of your heart and mine.

I'm sure that we would differ less
And clasp our hands in friendliness,
Our thoughts would pleasantly agree
If I knew you and you knew me.

Uncommon Sense

By John Blake

"STORAGE FOR VALUABLES"

IN YOUR imagination print those letters on your forehead.

Then arrange to store nothing but valuables behind them.

The valuables are to be found in plenty. You will find them in books, in experience, in conversations with intelligent and educated people.

All you need to do that they may be transferred to the storehouse behind your forehead is to pay attention to what you hear or read—and think about it afterward.

You can, if you choose, read every letter of every word on a printed page, and not, at the end of it, remember anything you have read.

Easy reading is poor reading. Unless your brain is at work stowing away what you have read, the time you spend turning the leaves is wasted.

At the end of a talk with some person who has something worth telling, spend a few minutes thinking it over.

If you do that you will store some of the valuables that have been given you.

Otherwise they will be lost.

Good teachers impress on pupils the importance of thinking over lessons or lectures after they have been given.

The reason that really great plays are not forgotten is that they are so impressive that you go back over them in your mind repeatedly, and at last come to remember a great deal of them.

The task of stocking the mind with things that are useful is a really difficult one—but it can be accomplished by concentration.

The alert brain will take in everything that is brought to it by the senses, and stow away a good part of it for after reference.

All that education means is training the brain to remember and to consider what it cannot help seeing and hearing, and to be careful to distinguish between what is useful and what is worthless.

There is no value in painfully learning by rote things which can be readily found in reference books, or in stocking away long lists of detached information.

This makes a lumber room out of your brain, instead of a storehouse.

Somewhere in those mysterious convolutions is abundant room to put an immense amount of knowledge, and to put it where it can be got at when it is wanted.

That sort of mind makes its owner resourceful and competent through his working days, and abundantly able to get pleasure out of life when the working days are over.

"FLEA" 20 MINUTES CROSSING CHANNEL

Makes Dover Passage at 93 Miles an Hour.

London.—George de Gasenko crossed the English channel from Boulogne to Dover in 20 minutes in his Sea Flea, which looks like a cross between a submarine and a seaplane.

The queer craft averaged 93 miles an hour for the trip, and the inventor was so cheered by his success that he predicted a similar craft, holding 100 passengers, could easily be built to cross the Atlantic in 40 hours.

De Gasenko's craft embodies the principles of water bugs. It draws only three inches of water, although 35 feet long and 18 feet high. The hull is of mahogany two-thirds of an inch thick. With a load of fuel it weighs only 2,000 pounds.

With two small wings and an airplane propeller, the Sea Flea at low speeds skims the surface of the water, but when it approaches its maximum it almost lifts it into the air, and like a flying fish flits from the crest of one wave to the crest of another, meanwhile maintaining a perfect balance, insuring against seasickness.

In May, 1926, after several short but successful tests, De Gasenko set out from Marseilles for a trip across the Mediterranean and along the African coast, but the propeller was splintered by a heavy sea and the inventor was obliged to put in at Saintes Maries, near Arles.

De Gasenko is a native of the Ukraine, but was trained in Germany and has been carrying out his recent work in France.

Engine Colors in Bay State Cause Dispute

Boston.—When officials of the Boston & Maine railroad decided to abandon the conventional black and paint two of their locomotives in colors, they little realized they were starting a controversy which was to involve historians, college professors and artists.

But such a controversy has developed over the railroad's choice of blue and buff as color representations of the uniforms worn by the Minute Men.

The locomotives selected for coatings of blue and buff were those attached to the road's crack trains which pass daily through those historic fields where the Minute Men battled the British a century and a half ago.

The state of Massachusetts, Sons of the Revolution, and the New England council had long looked upon blue and buff as the uniform colors of the Minute Men, but the current divergence of opinion has revealed that the first official color combination of the Continental forces was blue and white.

After various authorities had expressed their views, railroad officials announced that blue and buff had been chosen to typify the Minute Men only after exhaustive research, and indicated the locomotive would continue to sport that combination of colors.

Lobster Feels No Pain in Hot Water Plunge

London.—A lobster is not hurt by throwing it into boiling water any more than a telephone instrument is pained by being banged upon the floor, it is declared in an article by Dr. Harold Jackson of the Zoological department of London university.

"Pain is an entirely relative term," he says, "and except for ourselves, our near relatives, and possibly the most artificial domestic animals, it does not exist in the meaning we give the word. Pain in most lower animals acts as a sort of burglar alarm, which has no feeling of itself, but gives notice that something definite is wrong and can probably be set right by certain standardized actions.

"If animals really had the sensitive feelings that are sometimes attributed to them, what a horrible agony life in natural conditions would be for them. What nonsense it is to talk about the 'agony' of a lobster being plunged alive into boiling water!"

SPEED IN INDIAN RECORDS IS URGED

Alaska Tribes Are Forgetting Old Traditions.

Washington.—If the languages, beliefs, traditions and customs of the Alaskan Indians are not to go the way of those of so many other native American tribes and be forever lost to human history, ethnologists will have to work double time in the next few years. This is the warning brought back from an expedition to the Yukon by Herbert W. Krieger, ethnologist of the National museum under the Smithsonian institution.

Mr. Krieger found that the younger Indians have become thoroughly Americanized. For them the potlatches—once ceremonial events of great importance for the propitiation of those spirits who could insure good hunting or good fishing—are merely opportunities for a good time. They have forgotten their own magic and their tribal folk lore. Only the old people remember these things, and if they are to be preserved these old people must be interviewed before they die.

Traces Eskimo Sites.

Mr. Krieger's expedition was carried out with aid from the Joseph Henry fund of the National Academy of Sciences. Its main purpose was to follow up certain archeological and ethnological leads uncovered by Dr. Ales Hrdlicka in his survey of Alaska under the Smithsonian institution last year. Doctor Hrdlicka traced old Indian and Eskimo sites which might throw light on ancient man in Alaska and so help the solution of the vexed problem of man's origin in America.

As a result of Mr. Krieger's excavations at Bonasila and his investigations at Anvik, Hologochalk, Shageluk Slough and elsewhere along the Yukon, he believes that any archeological evidences of ancient man in the interior of Alaska are going to be very hard to find, though there is much of later date to be uncovered.

Mr. Krieger's most interesting discovery was made far from the mouth of the Yukon; it comprised examples of the carvings of a coast tribe unknown before last year when both Doctor Hrdlicka and the Canadian archeologist, Doctor Jenness, found specimens of these carvings, indicating the existence of the tribe on St. Lawrence and Nelson islands.

They are done in old ivory and are examples of an art unlike anything else known from Alaska. The modern natives dig them up from old graves and recarve the old ivory for commercial purposes, thus destroying many important specimens.

Evidence that a uniform stone culture prevailed at one time from the Yukon down to southeastern Alaska was uncovered by Mr. Krieger. He found certain stone implements, chiefly a type of ax, common to the entire area.

The places visited by Mr. Krieger on the lower Yukon represent the fusion points between the Eskimo and Indian cultures. Although the interior is now entirely Indian territory, Mr. Krieger found pottery, masks and other objects which typify Eskimo culture. The Indians there have many traditions of battles with the Eskimos.

Follows Trail to Idaho.

On his way back from Alaska Mr. Krieger continued earlier explorations for the bureau of American ethnology along the Columbia and Snake rivers. Last year he succeeded in tracing a single prehistoric culture characterized by semi-subterranean circular houses and cremation burials from British Columbia through Washington to Oregon. This year he followed traces of the same culture down the Snake river into Idaho, hoping that it would lead him into Utah and the northern outposts of early Pueblo culture, thus connecting the prehistoric peoples of the West from Canada to Arizona.

But he lost the trail in the Snake river canyon of central Idaho, the traditional home of the Bannock and other Shoshonean tribes.

"World's Biggest" Pie Has Ton of Apples

Yakima, Wash.—Heralded as the "world's biggest," an apple pie weighing more than a ton and requiring a specially constructed oven and a derrick for handling was baked in Yakima recently.

Four bakers, wielding rolling pins 15 feet long, rolled the dough for the crust. Fires were started a day ahead in the huge oven to assure the proper heat. Apples weighing 2,100 pounds were precooked in a cannery. The pie was of the open-faced variety, with strips of crust criss-crossing over the vast surface.

The baking of the pie was preliminary to celebration of Apple week. Two thousand school children, each of whom had been promised a bite of the pie, milled around the large outdoor oven while it was baking.

SPAIN GENTLE WITH WOMAN PRISONERS

Helps to Recall Inmates to Honest Ways.

Madrid.—Woman criminals are not numerous in Spain, and when they do commit crimes they are looked after by the authorities almost parentally.

The women's prison for those convicted in Madrid is a spacious institution under the direction of men, but the actual guardianship of the prisoners is confided to nuns. They guide their charges with gentleness, but are strong disciplinarians when necessary.

A large percentage of those convicted of robbery are the servant girls from outlying country villages. Others have been convicted for crimes of violence against husbands and numerous unmarried women for infanticide.

Everything is done in the woman's jail to recall the inmates back to honest ways. Work is provided for prisoners conducting themselves well. They are able to earn as much as $3 weekly at needlework and ironing. With their earnings they may purchase food luxuries. Some of them are thus able to add sweetmeats and other tidbits to the prison ration.

One of the greatest punishments for the women is to be expelled from the workshops for misconduct and confined to their cells.

After an hour's recreation in the open courtyard each day they are permitted to converse, but not loudly.

New Method Cleans Rusty Water Pipes

New York.—Rust-choked iron water pipes in a 35-story New York office building have been cleared by a new acid solvent, and the vast expense of repiping the whole structure avoided. The process, worked out by F. N. Speller, E. L. Chappell and R. P. Russell of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, is expected by engineers to become a very important factor in building management.

It has long been known that a solution of hydrochloric acid in hot water will dissolve rust, but the drawback has been that it will also dissolve iron and steel, so that it has never been considered practicable for use on a large scale. The three Massachusetts engineers, however, added an organic "inhibitor," which has the effect of preventing the acid from corroding the metal while still permitting it to attack the rust.

In order to carry out their operations with the least possible inconvenience to the tenants they divided the plumbing of the building into sections, attacking these one by one on Saturday afternoons, so that the solution could get in its work and be flushed out of the pipes before the resumption of business on Monday morning.

Forest Fires in 1926 Cost Over 26 Millions

Washington.—Forest fires in the United States last year caused more than $26,900,000 damage, according to the Agricultural department.

There were 91,793 fires. More than 72 per cent of the fires were caused by man and 12 per cent by lightning. No cause was obtainable for 16 per cent of those reported.

Mississippi, with 23,170 fires, suffered more than any other state, while Alabama was next with 14,953 and Georgia third with 6,448.

Southeastern states as a group—North and South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama and Mississippi, had more forest fires than any other section last year with 54,200 conflagrations reported.

Missouri, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Louisiana and Texas came next with 10,657 fires, the Northeastern states had 6,521, the Appalachian states 4,827, the East Mississippi states 1,747 and the Lake states 3,326, the Rocky mountain states 3,877, and the Pacific states 6,842.

Stone Lillies Found 150,000,000 Years Old

Stockton, Calif.—Stone lilies, dating back to the lower Devonian age of 150,000,000 years ago, are among the fossil specimens brought to the College of the Pacific by Prof Joa H. Jonte, head of the geology department, from fossil quarries in Iowa, where he passed the summer.

A fossil fish tooth, 135,000,000 years old, buried in a bit of coraline limestone, which had been kicked about for 15 years in a barnyard as "just a rock," is one of the most valuable specimens now on display at the college. Many of the specimens have not yet been classified, and work during the year will be concentrated upon this.

Professor Jonte pitched his camp in a deserted section of the State capitol quarry, where he said the fossils were so thick that the party, in an hour, had collected a thousand specimens, some perfect and some fragmentary, but all valuable.

CLARABEL'S SUCCESSFUL VENTURE

(© by D. J. Walsh.)

THE early morning sun streaming in through the open window aroused Clarabel Frost to the fact that another day had begun.

"Oh, dear!" murmured Clarabel, sitting up in bed and rubbing her eyes, "it surely can't be time to get up." But when she glanced at the small nickel clock which stood on the bedside table she saw that its hands pointed to fifteen minutes of five. "Well, here goes," she said with a sigh, and, slipping out of bed, began hurriedly to dress. A few moments later she descended the stairs to the kitchen and soon had a fire burning briskly in the old cook stove. She had begun to sing softly to herself when she was startled by a hoarse, croaking sound which came from an adjoining bedroom.

"Was that you, son?" she called in the direction from which the sound had come. Aren't you up yet?"

Another muffled sound caused her to hurry into the next room and, sure enough, there was Ezra burning up with fever and with cheeks puffed out like a chipmunk's.

"Why, Ezra Frost!" Clarabel exclaimed. "Whatever is the matter with you?"

"I don't know, mother," replied Ezra, hoarsely. "I have been sick all night, but I didn't call you because I thought I was only overtired and if I got a good night's sleep I would be all right this morning. But I guess I must have been out of my head, because the funniest things kept popping up in front of me every time I closed my eyes. I do wish you'd get me a good cold drink because my throat is simply scorched."

"I should think your throat would feel scorched, you poor dear," said Clarabel sympathetically. "You just lie still and I will get you something cooling to drink in a minute."

"But, mother," said Ezra in consternation, "you know I can't be sick, not today, at least, with that load of cauliflower to be delivered at the station at two o'clock. It is only half cut at that, and if we don't ship it today it will be a whole week before we can ship again and by that time it will begin to turn purple and we will have to sell it at a loss. And you know as well as I we need every cent. And we were sure that the cauliflower crop, if we could get it to market in prime shape, would pretty nearly bring enough to get us out of debt." and two big tears, in spite of tightly shut eyes, slid down Ezra's flushed cheeks.

Clarabel Frost was a widow and Ezra was her nineteen-year-old son who, since his father's death, had tried to take his place and shield his little mother, who was timid and not overstrong. So far he had been successful and Clarabel had been comfortable, and, in spite of her loss, happy in the protection of this big, good-natured boy of hers.

But when she saw those tears wrung from her boy's eyes as much from disappointment as the pain in his poor, swollen throat, all her motherhood was aroused and she felt herself fit to overcome any difficulty that might arise. Saying nothing to Ezra she went back to the kitchen and soon came back with a plate of cream toast and a cold drink. Poor Ezra tried to eat a bite, but found he could not swallow.

"I don't know what we can do, mother," wailed Ezra. "I am sure every man in the neighborhood will be busy today getting his own load to the station. We'll just have to let it go and get what we can out of the cauliflower next week. Where do you suppose I got the mumps anyway, and why did I have to have them this week of all times?"

Clarabel wondered herself, but she could only soothe Ezra and tell him not to worry, surely something would come up to help them out of the difficulty. And after making him as comfortable as she could left him and went about her work. She started in to wash dishes, and had only nicely begun when she left them and, hurriedly drying her hands on the roller towel, grabbed the big butcher knife and ran softly out of the house. straight as an arrow she went up the little hill back of the barn to the cauliflower patch. Here she set to work with a will and soon had a big pile of neatly trimmed cauliflower heads all ready to be loaded on the big farm truck. She went to the barn, which was only a few rods below the patch, and, getting a big handled basket, proceeded to fill it with the wonderful white heads, which she carried down to the barn and piled upon the truck. She made trip after trip and soon had the required number piled high on the truck. She was very tired and there were several big red blisters on her hands, but she went calmly back to the house and set about preparing dinner as if nothing unusual had occupied her time.

"Where have you been, mother?" Ezra asked when she took him his dinner. "Your face is awfully red and you look tired out. What have you been doing?"

"Why, just busy, son," Clarabel answered. "You know I always find plenty to do. Are you feeling any better?" she asked, and proceeded to help him to eat the broth she had heated for him. The hand trembled slightly, but Ezra was feeling too ill to take further notice. After he had finished his broth his mother smoothed his pillow and patted him on the head and telling him to try and get some sleep, like a good boy, and he would soon feel better, she left him.

Now the Frosts owned both a farm truck and an old worn-out flivver, and Ezra had thought it great sport to teach his mother to run the old car, and whenever they went to town he always let her drive, but she was pretty timid and usually when they reached the outskirts of the town she would stop the car and let him drive on when traffic thickened. Today in the light of her resolve she went out to the barn, climbed upon the high seat of the truck, and after some moments spent in careful thought put her foot firmly down on the starter button. An awful roar, which caused her to shiver, followed. Clarabel was horribly afraid of any loud noise, and she had never noticed when Ezra started the truck that it made such a racket. In fact, this was the first time she ever had been in the truck. But with mouth set in a little firm line she manipulated the gears and brake and slowly the big truck began to back out of the shed. She guided it into the road, turned, and finally got it headed for the station. What an infernal machine it was, or so she thought. It was a very different proposition to handle than the light flivver. It seemed possessed to run first on one side of the road and then the other. It took every ounce of strength she had to keep the thing out of the gutters. Her arms ached, her heart pounded, but she bit her lips and kept the thing going somehow. After an hour's struggle and many amused glances from her neighbors who were all hurrying toward the station with their own produce, Clarabel finally guided the cumbersome truck alongside the track where the freight car was waiting to receive her load, and brought it to a jerky standstill.

"Why, Mrs. Frost," said the freight agent, "how comes it you are driving your truck? Where's Ezra?"

"Ezra is home sick with the mumps, Mr. Binner," Clarabel answered. And as there was no one to bring the cauliflower—why, I just had to do it myself. Shall I help you unload it?" she added with a proud lift of her chin.

"Well, I should say not," said Mr. Binner, "I should say you had done just about enough to drive that load in. I am right glad you got here, too, because without this load my car wouldn't have been near full, and I would have had to ship at a loss."

Clarabel arrived home without mishap, tired, but triumphant. She washed her flushed face, smoothed her hair and then went in to see Ezra.

"Well, son," she said, "that cauliflower is well on its way to market."

"Why, how on earth did it get there?" gasped Ezra.

"I took it," said Clarabel proudly, and then followed an account of her adventure. It would be hard to say which was the prouder, Ezra or his mother.

Savage Virtues Need of Civilized World

If we civilized people want to continue life we must find the means of retaining savage virtues, of checking the ever more rapid deterioration of the human mind and body, and of conserving instincts of loyalty to our fellow man.

The Paya Indians in their home range along the Plaintain river in Honduras are admitted savages, while the thronging inhabitants of New York, London and Paris call themselves civilized. Yet there is a stronger distillate of bad manners, selfish purposes and low intelligence on Broadway or in the Strand than in Oriole village—not to mention bodily imperfections.

Native mentality is but slightly concerned in the mechanical success of this or that type of social structure. Civilized men in a very small fraction of the course of human development have accumulated a mechanical advantage rather than an absolute superiority over uncivilized ones. Brutality is hardly a proper character of savages or even of brutes. Real people of the wilds are timid and retiring creatures, for all their sturdiness of bone and muscle. They seem to support and comfort each other in the sharp struggle for existence. In the communion of nature they regard themselves as younger brothers of all the birds and beasts and suppliants to all the imagined sources of power and excellence in an unplotted universe.

In the long run there is little doubt that civilization permits the survival of the structurally unfit, and it may even go so far as to bring about the elimination of structurally fit persons by putting upon them such burdens as those of war. The average savage belongs to a more rigorously tested seed stock than does his cultured brother, even when he falls before some disease which the latter is able to withstand.—Prof. Herbert J. Spinden in the Forum.

Snake as Security

All records for unique securities are claimed by a Detroit hotel, which spent the last week in possession of a python, whose owner had left it in lieu of room rent. The snake kept the room to himself. No maids would approach him. The hotel felt kindly toward the visitor, and worried about his diet. At last the manager obtained a rabbit and put it in the room. The next day, no bunny. Then the question came up, how many bunnies per week? But that was never settled. The check for the room rent arrived and the snake went on.

Home Runs

The strange fighting that has been going on in Nicaragua led Gen. Hugh Drum to say at a Washington tea:

"They don't battle down there. The rebels' method is more like a street brawl. It reminds me of a story.

"Some years ago, in a war between Chili and Peru, a young war correspondent said to an old one:

"'Neither army goes in for uniforms and in consequence I can't tell which is which.'

"'Oh, that's easy,' said the old correspondent. 'If you see an army running towards Chile it's Chilean, and if it's running towards Peru it's Peruvian.'"—Kansas City Times.

High Finance

"I keep on reading about capital and labor, but I never understand about it."

"That's simple. You give me $10; that's the capital."

"And the labor?"

"That's what you have getting it back from me."—Madrid De Excelsior.

Jealousy

"Why were you speeding?" demanded the cop.

"I wasn't speeding," answered Mr. Brown humbly. "I was just trying to pass the man who bought my old car."

ATWATER KENT RADIO

It has come!

OVERWHELMING demand for Atwater Kent radio brings mass-production prices.

Atwater Kent Radio, because of its obvious and convincing superiority, won universal preference. When America approves, it buys. An avalanche of demand resulted. A two acre factory has expanded into an enormous plant covering fifteen and one-half acres.

As the great staff of Atwater Kent experimental engineers and radio scientists perfected one startling improvement after another, keeping Atwater Kent Radio always ahead in supremely satisfactory performance, the price-reducing power of mass production kept pace.

Now, Atwater Kent Radio, recognized the world over as the highest development of radio, is offered at prices which pass on to the public savings achieved by scientific manufacture on a gigantic scale.

Mayor's Proclamation

In conformity with the actions of President Coolidge and Governor Christiason in proclaming Thursday Nov. 24th, as a day of Thanksgiving, I, Mayor of the Village of Holt call upon the Village Residents to join the millions of our countrymen throughout the land to observe this day in the spirit for which it has been set aside.

Holt has again cause to be grateful to providence for another year of good fortune. No appeal for aid have been made for this section, on the other hand our people have continued to show faith in this community.

They have shown greater cooperation in performing their civic duties. They have continued to work hard and faithfully for the betterment of Holt.

Our forefathers set the example for us of observing a period of Thanksgiving. It is meet and proper that we close up our shops, halt the marts of trade, and devote the one day of the year to the Spirit of Thanksgiving.

Gilbert Sanoden,
Mayor of Holt.

Had Bad Smashup

A party from Crookston foundered on rocks near the C. E. Smith farm north of town on Sunday. The craft, a Buick, was sailing thru the air at the rate of 50 miles per, when it hit a hard wave in the road, which caused it to go clear over a couple times and land on a rock pile.

The occupants of the car escaped unhurt while the damages to the car consisted of a blown out tire, broken windshield, smashed wheel, and crushed top.

Prepare For Delays In Winter Driving

Warning to motorists not to undertake long trips unless they are fully equipped and prepared to undergo some hardships, was issued this week by the Minnesota Highway Department.

"The open winters which we had before last winter led some car owners to think they can at all times make cross-country trips in the winter as easily as in summer," said Commissioner C. M. Babcock. "A great deal of the time they can, but they should be prepared for the unexpected.

"Watch the weather forecast, but remember they are infallible," is his warning. "Snow storms may come when we least expect them. With the additional snow fence and plows, we hope to keep the trunk highways open most of the time. But no one can keep them open during a heavy snow storm. The snow plows cannot be everywhere at once. After severe storms it usually takes twelve hours, sometimes more, to open all the roads in any district."

If the winter is not too severe, however, the department will make an effort to keep all the highways open.

SHORT LESSONS IN DAIRYING

A series of 52 articles by Land O' Lakes Creameries and published by the Farmers Cooperative Creamery in the interests of its patrons.

LESSON II.

In the last lesson we mentioned the income from cows as $100 per year per cow being fair, $150 good, and $200 excellent, or an income of $8 to $16 per cow per month.

The income from cows will depend upon four factors: First, the production of the cows; that is, the amount of milk and butterfat they produce and the cost of its production; second, the form in which the product is sold, milk, cream, butter, etc.; third, the quality of the product, and fourth, the system of marketing.

Cooperative creameries pay best for the manufacture of butter, paying an average price of 7c more per pound for butterfat than is paid where there are no cooperative creameries, or an average of what would amount to $10 more per cow a year.

A record of the cooperative creameries for the past 25 years, in comparison with other systems, will prove this to be a fact. A cooperative creamery is a factory and gives the farmers the manufacturer's profit.

The prophecy came true. At the very next corner the girl turned to the left, and then held on, straight across two avenues, until she reached a street where the cars ran. She made as if to cross this street, too, for she went straight out to the middle of it; then stopped, obviously at fault, and retraced her steps to the car rail nearest the curb.

"Well, that's plain enough," said Ashton in a tone of disappointment. "She's brought us so far, but can't take us any farther, for here is where he took the car."

"Wait a bit," said th doctor. "Watch the girl."

She was crouched very low again, and quartering around in a circle, just as she had done at the foot of the standpipe. Presently, to the surprise of all of us, unless it may have been that the doctor guessed, she caught a scent that satisfied her and led her diagonally back to the sidewalk; and once here, without a pause, she set out in the direction of downtown, straight down the middle of the sidewalk, her gait, that seemed unhurried, unfaltering, a sure-footed compromise between a walk and a run.

"It seems to be all right," said Ashton rather breathlessly, as we hurried on after her, "only I don't quite see what he went out into the street for."

"To see if a car was coming, I suppose," said the doctor. "There wasn't one in sight, so, rather than risk waiting, he set out afoot. And I think he did wisely. I haven't seen a car in either direction. Have you?"

We had not, and, what was still more to the point, followed the girl at the rapid pace she set, for half an hour without seeing one.

When we had first set out with her, our curiosity as to what she would do prevented us from paying much attention to the condition of the streets; but when the chase had straightened itself out into this long pursuit down the avenue, we had time to think of our surroundings, and to speculate whether they bettered the chances of the man we were pursuing or improved our own for catching him. The trolley wires were evidently down in every direction, and the streets were so glassy with the frozen sleet and so perilous with the snapping, spitting ends of live wires that trailed here and there, that what little wheel traffic there was moved only with the very greatest difficulty. Without the means of tracing him, which the doctor's hypnotic power over the girl had provided us with, he would, after several hours, have been absolutely secure from pursuit. There would have been no other way in the world of hunting for him than by this simple, primitive method of tracking him by his scent.

It was fortunate for us that there were few pedestrians abroad that night, for the girl's strange, uncanny gait and our hurried, breathless pursuit of her would, in anything like normal conditions, have created a sensation which would have rendered the pursuit itself impossible. As it was, the few people who had ventured out found all they could attend to in the ice-glazed sidewalks, the wind-whipped corners, the fog and electrical peril of the streets. A few curious glances were cast after us as we went hurrying by, but that was about all.

Suddenly the doctor dropped a hand on my arm. "I know where she's going," he said. "I ought to have guessed it before ever we started. Look there," As he spoke, he pointed ahead and upward, through the fog, and, following the direction of his pointing finger, I made out, faintly, a luminous clock face.

"What is it?" said I. "I haven't kept track of where we were going. The fog confuses me."

"It's the Western station," said the doctor, "and Wilkins, my boy," he punctuated the remark with a buffet on my shoulder "Wilkins has gone to Oak Ridge! I ought to have known him well enough by this time to have foreseen that that was what he would do."

"I don't believe he'd be such a fool," said Ashton, "but I hope you're right. If he's gone to Oak Ridge, we've got him. I've got two men out in the Morgan house watching it, on the lookout for anyone who might turn up there, and nobody who does turn up will be able to get away until they have accounted to me for their visit."

We had all lagged a little. "Come along," said the doctor. "We mustn't get too far behind."

We were pretty well winded, all of us, but we gathered up our energies for a final sprint, and turned into the great waiting room just behind her.

She went straight to the ticket window, but without a pause there or a glance through, she turned in a sharp angle, exactly as a dog would do, and padded across the waiting room toward the doors which opened into the train shed.

"Follow her!" the doctor commanded Mallory. "I'll see about the trains."

I was at his elbow when he spoke to the clerk. That functionary was gazing after the girl with wide, terrified eyes.

"In Heaven's name!" he said, "what is she? A woman or a beast?"

The doctor did not answer. He ignored the question utterly.

"When is the next train for Oak Ridge due?" he asked.

The ticket clerk rubbed his hands over his eyes. "Did you see her?" he asked. "That creature that just went through the door?"

I did not wonder that he was horrified. I remembered my own feeling when I had seen her start down the corridor toward Wilkins' room.

The doctor paid no attention, and in the same level voice in which he had spoken before, he repeated his question about the train for Oak Ridge.

With an effort, the clerk rallied his wits and answered him.

"There was a train pulled out about ten minutes ago," he said. "There won't be another tonight. The wires are down on account of the sleet, and we've practically abandoned the suburban service. It's too dangerous. Everything has to run without orders."

"Did you hear that, Ashton?" said the doctor, turning away. "The last train to Oak Ridge that will run tonight left ten minutes ago."

CHAPTER X

Ashton had followed Malloroy part way across the waiting room, a little nervous, I think, at the idea of letting the girl out of his sight. So he had not heard what the clerk had just told Doctor McAlister through the ticket window.

"Well," he said, "that is all right, isn't it? We don't want to go to Oak Ridge. If the train Wilkins took started only ten minutes ago, there's ample time to arrange to have him arrested before he sets foot on the platform at Oak Ridge. Where's the telegraph office in this station?"

"It won't do you any good," said Doctor McAlister. "There will be no telegraphic communication with Oak Ridge tonight."

Ashton glanced thoughtfully about the room. "That possibility hadn't occurred to me," he said at last.

"It occurred to Wilkins," said the doctor. "That's why he went. He's the one man of us who really grasped the situation. He knew just what that sleet storm meant—that over a territory fifteen or twenty miles square electricity was going out of the business of serving civilization for a few hours. That one vital fact turns the world topsy-turvy, and makes some difficult things easy and some commonplace things impossible. For just tonight our thoughts can't move any quicker than our bodies can. So Wilkins has set out for Oak Ridge, and we can't head him off. The only thing we can do is to follow him. The question is, shall we try to do that?"

I followed Ashton's glance just then, and saw Mallory coming back with the girl. She seemed unconscious of his presence, and made straight across the room to where the doctor was standing in conversation with us. She halted beside him without a word, her manner perfectly quiet, though expectant. She was merely waiting for him to tell her what he wanted done next.

For the moment he paid no attention to her, did not even glance sideways at her as she came up.

"That's the question," he repeated to the attorney. "Shall we try to go out to Oak Ridge tonight? You spoke of having two men on watch there all the time. Can you safely leave the matter of coping with Wilkins to them?"

Ashton walked away a few paces, then whirled and came back. His look was troubled, disquieted.

"I wish you were there, Mallory," he said. "Green and Benson aren't any too wide awake. They'll have a man to deal with who has just outwitted us."

"There are two courses of action open to us," said the doctor. "One is, to go home and go to bed. The other is, to get hold of an automobile and try to get out to Oak Ridge tonight. Our getting there at all is problematical with the roads in the present condition."

Ashton whirled round and spoke to Mallory, "Go and telephone to the nearest garage for an automobile; quick!" he said. Then, addressing us, he went on: "There is no necessity for your going, Doctor McAlister, or Mr. Phelps, either. But Mallory and I can't afford to waste a minute."

"You've wasted one already," said the doctor, "telling Mallory to go into that telephone booth."

Ashton, heartily cursing his own stupidity, darted off after his messenger.

"I think I'll go along with them," said I to the doctor, "just on the chance of my being of some service."

He laughed. "Are you thinking you'll leave me behind? Come, Phelps, you know me better than that. No, we'll all go."

His gesture included the strange, silent, expectant figure that had been standing at his elbow all the time.

"Do you mean to take her?" I questioned.

"She's brought us so far. She's given us, up to this point, every material fact that has made it possible for us to establish Haines' identity and get on his trail."

It just happened then that my eyes were on the girl. I saw her shiver, saw a look of human intelligence and perplexity appear for the first time in that strange face of hers. I tried, with a nod, to direct my chief's attention to her, but before he could get my meaning, Ashton came hurrying back.

"There's a garage only two or three blocks away," he said, "and Mallory ought to be back with a car in a very few minutes."

Then he held out his hand to the doctor. "I can't begin to tell you," said he, "how grateful I am for the help you've given us, nor for your patience with my unenlightenment."

"No valedictories now," said the doctor interrupting. "You're not going to be rid of us so easily. We're all going with you."

"Good!" said Ashton. "I hoped you would, though I felt I hadn't any right to ask it of you. Come! There's the motor. Let's lose no time."

My memory of the next two hours is one of unrelieved discomfort and constantly increasing apprehension. We skidded across street car tracks and had a dozen of what in normal times we should have called narrow escapes, in the first dozen minutes. After that, we stopped counting. The excitement of the chase was mounting in our veins.

"He must be there by this time," said Ashton at last with a shudder. "I wish I knew that Green and Benson were still alive."

"I tell you he won't kill," said the doctor, "not if he can help it. He'll do it if they succeed in forcing his hand; that I admit. But his own cleverness is the greatest safeguard those two men could have—his cleverness and their stupidity."

"I wish I shared your confidence," said Ashton.

"Think a minute what the situation is," said the doctor. "Suppose we had him now, safely, in our hands. We know what he is. We know that he is morally responsible for the murder of Henry Morgan. But suppose you were not the district attorney. Suppose that Haines came to you and retained you in his defense. Wouldn't you tell him that, with the criminal law in its present state and the methods of prosecuting criminals what they are today, you would have an excellent chance of ridding any case that we could make? Wouldn't you tell him that, never in the world, could he be convicted of murder in the first degree, by any court or any jury?"

"Yes," said Ashton ruefully, "I suppose that's true."

"You may be sure," the doctor continued, "that Wilkins realizes that. And realizing it, you may be certain, also, that he will not commit an indubitable first-degree murder, if he can help it."

"Murder—"

The word made us all start. It was uttered, hardly above a whisper, by the wild half-human creature, through whose instrumentality we had been able to get on the true murderer's trail. And yet, in some subtle way, she had spoken in a new voice; not the soft-throated guttural speech of the Maori girl, nor yet in Jane Perkins' New Zealand modification of cockney.

Wanted No Witnesses to Theatrical Flight

In Sir James Barrie's play "Peter Pan," Tinker Bell gets up on her stage wings, hovers about the room and flies out of an open window. The playwright, watching one of his rehearsals, expressed a desire to try the mechanism by which this flight is achieved. So attendants attached the wires to the distinguished gentleman and prepared to hoist him in the air.

The amusing part of the story followed. Sir James, a veteran in the world of the theater, was suddenly struck by a terrible and overwhelming stage-fright. He commanded that every one leave the boards, and had the front curtain put down and the pass doors securely closed.

Then, alone in the room between the backdrop, the curtain and the wings, he was lifted up, maneuvered over Tinker Bell's route, and, in all his disheveled dignity, soared out the window unperceived.

Darwin's Life Work

Darwin, the famous expounder of the theory of evolution, was born in 1809, the son of a physician of Shrewsbury, England. From 1831 to 1836 he made his voyage round the world in the Beagle, on which he was the naturalist. In 1859 he published his great work, "Origin of Species." Subsequently he elaborated and defended his theory. Among these works was the "Descent of Man." He died in 1882

Played in Double Luck

Two occupants of an automobile that figured in a double accident narrowly escaped death in Middletown, N. Y. The automobile went over an embankment at the side of a railroad bridge, dropped fifty feet to the track below and landed right side up. The occupants, entirely unhurt, had just time to get out of the automobile before a train rounded a curve and demolished the car.

Conscience Bade Him Comfort "Other Six"

Dr. R. D. McKenzie, the well known sociologist of the University of Washington, said at a dinner in Seattle:

"Criminals are queer. They may not be exactly insane, but they have queer notions about right and wrong—queer, absurd notions.

"A detective tells how a notorious bigamist whom he'd tracked down sent for him one day from the jail. It was a case of conscience. The bigamist, in his queer, criminal way, felt twinges of remorse.

"Sitting there in his cell, he said: "'My conscience has been troubling me. I don't care a darn about my first three wives; they can go to Jericho as far as I'm concerned; but the other six are all right, and I wish you'd take them a message from me, will you? Thanks. Just tell that I've been faithful to them in thought and deed.'"

If Kidneys Act Bad Take Salts

Says Backache Often Means You Have Not Been Drinking Enough Water

When you wake up with backache and dull misery in the kidney region it may mean you have been eating foods which create acids, says a well-known authority. An excess of such acids overworks the kidneys in their effort to filter it from the blood and they become sort of paralyzed and loggy. When your kidneys get sluggish and clog you must relieve them, like you relieve your bowels, removing all the body's urinous waste, else you have backache, sick headache, dizzy spells; your stomach sours, tongue is coated and when the weather is bad you have rheumatic twinges. The urine is cloudy, full of sediment, channels often get sore, water scalds and you are obliged to seek relief two or three times during the night.

Either consult a good, reliable physician at once or get from your pharmacist about four ounces of Jad Salts; take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast for a few days and your kidneys may then act fine. This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to help clean and stimulate sluggish kidneys, also to neutralize acids in the system, so they no longer irritate, thus often relieving bladder weakness.

Jad Salts is inexpensive, cannot injure and makes a delightful, effervescent lithia-water drink. Drink lots of soft water.

The BABY

No mother in this enlightened age would give her baby something she did not know was perfectly harmless, especially when a few drops of plain Castoria will right a baby's stomach and end almost any little ill. Fretfulness and fever, too; it seems no time until everything is serene.

That's the beauty of Castoria; its gentle influence seems just what is needed. It does all that castor oil might accomplish, without shock to the system. Without the evil taste. It's delicious! Being purely vegetable, you can give it as often as there's a sign of colic; constipation; diarrhea; or need to aid sound, natural sleep.

Just one warning: it is genuine Fletcher's Castoria that physicians recommend. Other preparations may be just as free from all doubtful drugs, but no child of this writer's is going to test them! Besides, the book on care and feeding of babies that comes with Fletcher's Castoria is worth its weight in gold.

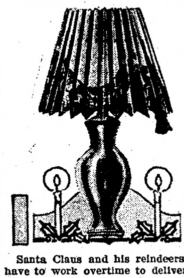
What to Give at Christmas Time

Decorated Magazine Rack

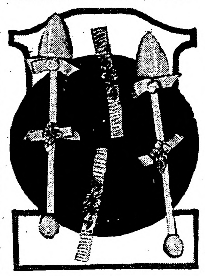
There's no end of handsome Christmas presents to be made which are sealing-wax painted. For example, here is this decorative magazine or newspaper rack, so charming for the living room. You buy the simple wooden frame, then paint it with sealing wax which has been dissolved in denatured alcohol. The color scheme for the rack pictured is geranium red for the outside, black for the inside. The flower is cut out of "illustrated" crepe paper and pasted on. And listen to this—the ornamental border design is the edge of a gold lace paper dollie—the center being cut away. It is gued on, then together with the flower it is gone over with transparent dissolved amber sealing wax.

Plaited Parchment Shades



Santa Claus and his reindeers will have to work overtime to deliver the many sleigh loads of painted parchment lamp shades which are now "in the making." Clever women are buying these plaited shades undecorated, so as to give them the personal touch of hand embellishment. Many are "saying it" with "scissors painting." One uses scissors instead of a brush, cutting out pictures from decorative crepe paper. These are then carefully pasted on the shade and finally gone over with a coat of transparent amber sealing wax paint. The finished work looks like genuine hand painting.

Christmas Remembrances



Among the lovely remembrances which Christmas brings to fair woman, or if it fails to bring, registers disappointment for someone, are dainty garter sets and shoe-trees. Now that the short skirt vogue is placing garters on display, there is a renewed enthusiasm for this item of feminine vanity. Likewise one's shoes must look the prink of perfection these days, which makes shoe-trees a necessity to keep them in shape. The lovely little hand-made flowers which so adorn both garters and shoe-trees, are veritable works of art.

Dainty Handkerchief Case

Remembering that Santa Claus is sure to bring his usual quota of handkerchiefs to every member of the family, a case to put them in is a very timely gift. Aside from its usefulness a handkerchief case as here pictured adds a note of beauty to any boudoir. There is quite a lace craze on just now for things decorative about the home as well as for personal adornment. These perfumed lace cases come satin-padded in any desired tone or tint.

When Mary Jones Disappeared

By AD SCHUSTER

(Copyright.)

IT WAS the day of the fire in Mother Lawrence's button shop that Clovertown realized its possession of a mystery. First, it was found that the girl who roomed over the burned shop was gone and then, when attention was given this quiet woman, it was discovered no one knew where she worked or much concerning her comings and goings. Mary Jones in the flesh was a modest and lonely girl occupying a single room over the establishment in which Mother Lawrence mended shirts and darned socks for bachelors. Now that she was gone she became subject for puzzled comment.

A rumor that Mary had been burned with the little building in which she lived was set at rest by Mother Lawrence herself.

"First thing I did," the matronly proprietor of needlework first-aid station said, "was to run up and see if Mary was there. The room was empty. Mary was gone."

Slowly the gossip spread. When it was determined that no one knew where Mary had worked it was assumed she must be an idler. Others recalled that the girl had never been seen on the streets in the daytime although more than once, in the evenings, she had graced the theater of the main dining room of the Clovertown hotel. The police questioned Mother Lawrence as the one best acquainted with the mysterious Mary.

"I've been busy, you know that," Mother Lawrence replied, smiling in a sweet way which was her main stock in trade. "You know I fix the clothes for the men who have no wives or sisters or mothers and it keeps me busy all the time. Now you speak of it, I don't remember seeing Mary in the daytime. Perhaps I have heard her walking about overhead. I don't know, it's hard to tell. I always liked Mary, though, she was so pretty and lighthearted. I can't see why she should run away just because the place burned down. If my opinion is asked I think when she saw her clothes and belongings were burned up she bought a ticket, took a train, and moved away."

And Mother Lawrence proved right. A few days later when the ruins of the shop had been cleared up in preparation for rebuilding Mary came back. She had taken the opportunity to visit friends in another city, she said, and she could not understand why the station agent, ticket seller, and even the conductor on the train had failed to remember that she was a passenger. There was some wondering and doubt, then came another sensation. Mother Lawrence was gone!

Clovertown loved Mother Lawrence as a friend in need and because she fitted so well the traditional picture of the motherly woman anxious to serve her fellows.

"She would have said 'good-by.' There is something really peculiar and terrifying about this." And in their perplexity the town asked Mary Jones for an answer to the riddle.

"Can't you see," said the girl. "The burning of this place has broken her heart. She was wrapped up in the little business, felt she was doing a large, though simple work, and when she was forced to sit in idleness waiting for the shop to be rebuilt she worried. I think she just had to get away."

It was really cruel of Mother Lawrence to appear again suddenly and without a word of explanation, but more cruel of Mary Jones to time her second disappearance with the return of the older woman. Clovertown became convinced the two women were plotting as practical jokers and said as much when Mother Lawrence shook her head and refused to answer questions. Then came a smile on the woman's face.

"It is too much," she said, "too hard a task playing both parts when there are not a shop and room overhead to help." And Mother Lawrence removed her gray hair, fluffed up the bob underneath and started wiping the traces of make-up from her face.

"I couldn't be a mother to the town and only twenty-three," she said, "and now, just because of your curiosity I will have to give up a paying business." And Mary Jones, emerged from the role of Mother Lawrence, looked appealingly for sympathy.

What a Nerve!

A friend of mine reports that, in a charitable mood, she invited two sweet souls from an old ladies' home here in town to be her dinner guests.

After they had eaten, she decided that they would enjoy listening to the radio as much as anything else, so she put them both in comfortable chairs with pillows at their backs, and tuned in on a speech by one of Cleveland's leading pulpit orators, telling of the real meaning of democracy and urging his hearers to l the spirit of democracy rule their daily lives.

But the hostess noticed that one of the old ladies was growing a bit fidgety. After a few nervous glances about her, this soft-spoken guest addressed the hostess shyly:

"I—I don't think I ought to listen to this. My husband was a good Republican, and here this man is telling us we should all be Democrats!"—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

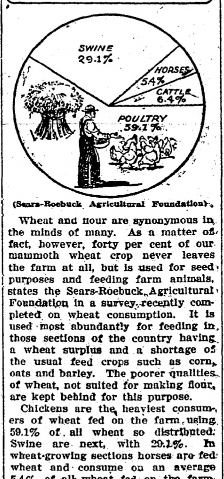
Chickens Top Wheat Eaters



(Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation).

Wheat and flour are synonymous in the minds of many. As a matter of fact, however, forty per cent of our mammoth wheat crop never leaves the farm at all, but is used for seed purposes and feeding farm animals, states the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation in a survey recently completed on wheat consumption. It is used most abundantly for feeding in those sections of the country having a wheat surplus and a shortage of the usual feed crops such as corn, oats and barley. The poorer qualities of wheat, not suited for making flour, are kept behind for this purpose.

Chickens are the heaviest consumers of wheat fed on the farm, using 59.1% of all wheat so distributed. Swine are next, with 29.1%. In wheat-growing sections horses are fed wheat and consume on an average 5.4% of all wheat fed on the farm, while the remaining 6.4% goes to cattle.

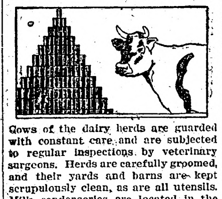
Purity of Milk Protected Now By Scientists

By KATHRYN ST. JOHN

Careful housewives constantly make it a point to ascertain the quality of each item that goes on their tables. Preparing food for the family is an extremely important job, for the proper selection and preparation of foods make in a large measure for the health and happiness of the family.

Milk is the most nearly perfect food, but it is a very delicate one as well. The keeping qualities of milk are slight. Danger from contamination is ever present. Evaporated milk, which is double rich because of the removal of 60 per cent of the water, is science's solution to these conditions.

Safeguarding evaporated milk is worked out as perfectly as man's ingenuity has been able to make the process. From cow to can, the milk which goes into the evaporated product is watched every step of the way.



Cows of the dairy herds are guarded with constant care and are subjected to regular inspections by veterinary surgeons. Herds are carefully groomed, and their yards and barns are kept scrupulously clean, as are all utensils. Milk condenseries are located in the heart of the big dairy regions to facilitate speedy handling, for this is essential if the milk is to be canned at "its moment of maturity." Canvas-covered trucks haul the milk to market, thus protecting the product from contamination on the way. Arriving at the condensery, the milk goes through tests for acidity, sediment, flavor and butterfat content before it is accepted.

Experts watch the progress of the milk through every step of its way. It goes into the evaporating machine; to the homogenizer, which breaks up the fat globules so that the milk may be easily digested by the consumer; by way of the almost human filling machine into sterilized cans; then into the sterilizer, where the cans are surrounded by steam and boiling water, destroying any possible bacteria. Inspectors handle the product as the last step to see that the canning job has been perfectly done. Labeling and packing follow. The housewife obtains the milk as fresh and sweet as when it came from the cow.

Wolf-hunting seems to be the main sport in this community at the present time. This of course is for the best, as the more of them the hunters shoot the fewer there will be at the editoa's door this winter. As the situation stands now, if some of the delinquent subscribers don't pay up, they may also join in the wolf hant, as there is apt to be a raft of them after us before long

Golden Rule Sunday to be Observed Here

International Golden Rule Sunday, the day which is set aside all over the world to focus public attention on the needs of the orphaned children in Greece, Armenia, Persia, and Palestine who are now being cared for by the Near East Relief, will be observed on December 4 this year. On that day the people of Holt are asked to substitute plain fare for the customary Sunday chicken and dumpling, Governor Theodore Christianson, state chairman of the Golden Rule Committee, announced.

"True sentiment, not sentimentality, marks the observance of Golden Rule Sunday," Governor Christianson writes. "It is something more than the giving of money; it is an opportunity to express true Christian brotherhood. My earnest desire is that Golden Rule Sunday be observed in all of the communities of the state."

Orphans under the care of the Near East Relief are trained as carpenters, agriculturalists, tradesmen, and a few as teachers and nurses. They are taught to be useful, self reliant, independent, and happy. The task of the Near East Relief, in relation to each individual child, is not over is not over until the child is an established part of the community in which he or she is placed.

A new plan of organization which is to make each church a unit for the observance of Golden Rule Sunday will be used here instead of the house-to-house canvass. The following committee has been delegated to take charge of the campaign: Mrs. A. L. Carlson, Mrs. Alfred Anderson, and Mrs. G. Sanoden, all of the Lutheran church.

Drainage Project Was Set Afoot Tuesday Night

A rousing meeting of farmers from the eastern part of the county was held in the school house here on Tuesday evening, at which they discussed the flood water situation of the eastern part of this county and western part of Beltrami county along the Marshall county line.

The meeting was called by the Holt Commercial Club who last week held a special meeting to start the move for Federal Aid for the area effected by flood waters in the eastern part of Marshall county. The Thief River is to small and has not got enough fall to take care of all the water that accumulates in the Mud Lake and Thief Lake basins in the wet seasons, and which have no other outlet than the Thief River.

A committee was organized to handle the matter. K. O. Flakne was elected chairman, P. R. Palmer secretary, and several others were named as members of the committee who drew up a resolution which they sent to Congressman C. G. Selvig, who will assist the affected district in getting some relief in the matter as soon as possible.

Many farms have been vacated in this part of the county the post few years on account of the high water and floods, and it is now hoped that the government will do something to relieve the situation so that those who did stick can continue to do so, and also make it possible for others to settle here. The land is good and will grow fine crops, but the fear of floodwater keeps a lot of settlers out of the district.

Mail Christmas Gifts Early

When a legal holiday falls on a Sunday, the postal laws provide that all postoffices observe Monday as a holiday. Christmas and New Years come on Sunday, therefore there will be no deliveries on the following Monday. If letters and parcels are not delivered by Dec. 24th they will have to lay over until Dec. 27th.

Christmas parcels and letters should be mailed on or before Dec. 17th, and marked "Do not open until Xmas." It is a physical impossibility for the postoffice folks to handle all holiday mail in only one week. Mail early and avoid the rush.

New Ford Car Showing at T. R. Falls Today

The full story of the new Ford automobile, described by Henry Ford as being "superior in design and performance to any now available in the low price, light car field," will be told first in Thief River Falls next Friday, December 2, according to an announcement today by Sandeen's Garage.

A public reception is to be held there simultaneously with similar gatherings at every Ford dealer in the United States, thus constituting a part of the greatest automobile show in the history of the industry.

While no detailed descriptions have yet been given out by Sandeen's Garage, the Ford Motor Company, from its headquarters in Detroit, has announced that the new Ford car will be as far in advance of present public demand for speed, flexibility, control in trffic and economy of operation as the famous Model T was in advance of public demand when it was introduced in 1908.

Dealers have not yet been advised as to the price at which the new Ford line will sell, but definite assurance has come from Detroit that the prices will be in accord with the policy of the Ford Motor Company to provide the best possible automobile at the lowest possible price.

Complete specifications and pictures of the new Ford Car which is expected to make a new chapter in automobile history will be shown at Thief River Falls on Friday, December 2.

Car Clips Off Telephone Pole; Nobody is Hurt

A party of four people from near Williams, Minn., had a close call here on Friday when they attemdted to pass a speeding car on the highway near the C. E. Smith farm home north of town. The Williams people who were returning home in a new Willis-Knight sedan, were cutting-her-up at a very high rate per hour when they tried to pass the other car, going their way, with the result being, that their new car left the road, jumped the ditch, and crashed into a heavy telephone pole which it sheared off close to the ground. That the pole broke, is no doubt but only reason that their lives were saved, as it was, the car was damaged to the extent of a broken front axle, smashed wheels, crushed radiator and hood, the windshield and other windows were also shattered.

The occupants escaped with only a bad shaking-up, and upon examining their car closely they estimated their loss at $180.00, and it may cost more to fix it up.

Only last week a party from Crookston had a similar smashup, near the Smith farm when they hit a rock pile.

Mr. and Mrs. Gust Williams of Greenbush and Christine and Milla Fosholn were entertained at the T. J. Ness home Sunday.

NOTICE FOR BIDS

Sealed bids will be received by the Farmers' Cooperative Creamery Company, Holt, Minnesota, to deliver up to 175 cords of tamarack or green white poplar wood, delivered to the Creamery. The poplar wood should not be less than 4 inches in diameter before it is split, as wood less than 4 inches is worth less and paid for on that basis.

Bids may be on 5 cords and up to 175 cords: bids must be in the hands of the Secretary before 2 o'clock p. m., Monday, December 5th, 1927. The Board reserves the right to reject any bid or all bids.

LESSON III.

A daily ration of 10 pounds of hay, 30 pounds of corn silag and 8 pounds of grain for a dairy cow may be taken as a basis for the production of a pound of butterfat a day during the stall feeding period.

The size of the cow, the amount and test of the milk and the kind and quality of feed on hand, all have a bearing on the amount of feed to use.

In estimating the cost of a ration this year, hay may be figured at ½c a pound, silage ¼c a pound and ground farm grown grains at 1¼c per pound—mill feed, high in protein, from 1½c to 2½c per pound.

With butterfat from 45c to 50c and above there is good prafit in dairying with good cows.

—18—

And when we looked at her, even in the dimly lighted interior of the limousine, her appearance was different, too. The difference was as subtle as it was unmistakable. What we saw was another—[illegible]cally new personality. It was as if the partition walls which had separated the personality of the stupidly respectable chambermaid from that of the untamed savage of the South seas were breaking down; as if these two widely sundered persons were merging into one. Neither Jane Perkins nor Fanenna could have uttered the word "murder" in just that accent of half-apprehended horror.

We were nearing our journey's end. Our road lay alongside the railroad line, and already we could see the one light in the Oak Ridge station window. There was no time to grapple with the new problem.

Then the chauffeur spoke to us through the little speaking tube which connected the chauffeur's seat with the interior of the limousine:

"There's a house on fire, up ahead there."

We all looked, and instantly saw a sudden lurid light, which was piling up the sky; saw it pierced the next moment by angry orange-colored flames.

"He's set fire to the house!" the doctor cried; and added, into the speaking tube, "Put on all the speed you can! We've no time to waste!"

The chauffeur obeyed, and within two minutes we were at the scene of the fire. The cold air of the winter night was already resonant with the shouts of the firemen and the excited exclamations of the crowd of half-dressed citizens who had gathered to render what assistance they could, and to enjoy the spectacle at the same time.

Mallory had already swung the door open and was half way out of the car, when an exclamation from the doctor stopped him.

"Hold on!" he cried. "This isn't the house. The Morgan house is two blocks further on down the street. Drive on!" he shouted to the chauffeur. "We mustn't waste a minute!"

Mallory sprang back to his seat, and once more the car lurched forward. The doctor held the door with one hand and leaned far out, scanning the road ahead with eager eyes.

"Drive slow," he cautioned the chauffeur.

Then he turned and spoke to us inside the car. "I've an idea that we better not drive right up to the house. There's no need of giving any more warning than necessary of the fact that we're coming. Look out ahead here. Phelps. Isn't that white gate half way down the next block the gate to the Morgan yard?"

I peered out over his shoulder. "Yes. I couldn't mistake that," said I.

"Good," said the doctor. "Stop here."

We four men clambered out of the car, the girl still fast asleep, still leaning back against the cushions in the corner, undisturbed by the confusion of our dismounting from the car.

"What shall we do with her?" I inquired. "I suppose she's safe enough where she is. She'll hardly wake up until you tell her to, will she?"

"No. The sleep is hypnotic," said the doctor. "She'll be safe enough here so far as that goes."

"It comes down to this," said Ashton. "If Wilkins is in the house, we sha'n't want the girl. She'd be in the way, for if he's cornered, he'll make a stiff fight. But if he's been to the house and done his work and already got away, and we're too late for him, as I fancy we are, then we'll have to use the girl again to track him. There's no other way."

"Then the thing to do," said the doctor, "is to make a reconnaissance. If he's already been here and searched the house for what he wanted and gone away, that fact will be easily apparent, and, as you say, it's the first thing to find out. Come, we've wasted time enough. The girl will be perfectly safe here."

"Hold on," said Ashton. "Why should we all go? We might defeat our purpose that way. Send Mallory. He's worth all the rest of us put together at fences and locks, and that sort of thing. He can find out in five minutes whether that house has been entered or not, and he won't attract one-twentieth part of the attention that four of us will."

The doctor nodded.

Without waiting for any further bidding, Mallory rushed off in the darkness, up the street toward the white gate. The rest of us stood just where we were, on the sidewalk, twenty paces or so from the automobile. We had nothing to do but wait for Mallory's return, and under such circumstances time, as a rule, drags heavily. But long before we expected his return, almost, it seemed, before he could have reached the house, we heard, coming toward us, the footsteps of a man running.

The three of us shrank back into the shadows, tensely alert for whatever this unexpected development might mean. But as the approaching figure emerged into the zone of light cut by the great gas lamps of our automobile, we saw that it was Mallory himself, Mallory hurrying toward us in an agony of haste, beckoning frantically, his eyes blazing with excitement.

We sprang forward to meet him.

"He's there!" he gasped. "Wilkins, himself! He's up in the study! There's a light, and the blinds are down; but I saw his shadow on the blind."

As we drew nearer the gate, our pace slackened cautiously. Ashton was a little in advance of the rest of us, and was the first to peer around the mass of shrubbery, which screened the house from the view of the street, except at the one point where the gate made an opening. I saw him stop and stiffen, and heard him catch his breath with a gasp.

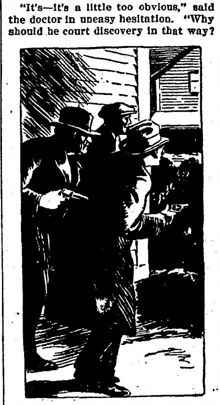
"That's him," he whispered. "We've got him."

The next moment I saw it, too—the silhouette upon the blind of a figure in cap and ulster, bending studiously forward over the desk, in the chair in which Henry Morgan had sat when he met his death.

"Yes," I heard my chief say in a piercing whisper; "yes, we've got him—unless, unless, in some way, he's counted on making us think we had him—when we hadn't."

"Why do you think that?" Ashton demanded under his breath.

"It's—it's a little too obvious," said the doctor in uneasy hesitation. "Why should he court discovery in that way?



The Three of Us Shrank Back Into the Shadows.

Why should he be sitting there with his shadow on the blind, when he knows that half the town has been roused by this fire?"

Ashton started forward impatiently. "This is no time for theories," he muttered.

But the doctor laid a detaining hand upon his arm. "No," he said, "that's a valid question. If there's no trick about it, the man can't get away. If there is a trick, it's success will depend upon our doing the very thing that you propose to do—rushing ahead without stopping to think."

"Listen a minute," said Ashton, still in a whisper, but speaking with fierce impatience. "He must have set fire to that other house himself. He cannot have thought of a better scheme for drawing my men off the job. Once Wilkins saw them out of the house, he knew he had nothing to fear. He could make his search at leisure. And now he's found the things he wants, has found that map that he's been dreaming about for years, he's not thinking about his shadow nor the blind it falls on."

To me it seemed that the doctor's question had been fairly answered, and I moved forward, as Mallory and Ashton did. My chief hesitated an instant, then gave a nod of assent.

Mallory pulled open the gate. We all followed through it. Then I glanced up once more at the lighted window blind.

"Look!" I cried. "He's gone!"

One glance was all they needed. The silhouette of that figure had disappeared.

Ashton turned to Mallory and spoke so fast that the words trod on each other's heels.

"You stay outside," he commanded. "He may try the windows if he's cornered. You're the best man we've got on a chase. Don't hesitate to shoot! Come along, the rest of you!"

Together we rushed up the path, Ashton ahead and my chief and I just behind him. But, with all our haste, we ascended the steps and crossed the wooden veranda silently. The front door was not even latched. It swung back with a light push, and we were inside.

"I'll go to the kitchen," Ashton said, "and cover the back stairs, and work up from there. You two, between you, see that he doesn't get down the front stairs, and search the rooms on each floor before you go any higher."

Both of us nodded comprehendingly, and he darted away. I stayed in the hall, while the doctor searched the downstairs rooms which made up the front of the house.

In a minute or two my chief rejoined me in the hall. "He's not here," Ashton whispered. "Come, let's go upstairs. We'll draw this floor next, just as we did the other. You, Phelps, guard the head of the front stairs, I'll guard the back and the doctor can search the rooms."

Carefully as he searched, we drew blank again.

"All right," Ashton whispered. "He's still in the study, then. It's queer we don't hear him, though."

"Do you think he can have got out by one of the windows?" I questioned.

"Not with Mallory on the lookout outside. I told him to shoot, and he would. Come along! Follow me."

The study door was closed, but we could see the light shining out from under it. Ashton flung open the door. But from that silent room there never same a sound.

We waited a moment. Then, breathlessly and cautiously, we entered.

The room was empty.

For a moment we stared blankly into each other's faces. Then a grim, full-mouthed laugh from the doctor shattered the strained silence. He clutched Ashton's arm and pointed.

"Look! Look there!"

On the floor, beside the swivel chair, half under the desk, was a great caped-ulster and a hat, a bundle of bed clothes, a bolster and a small pillow.

"There!" cried the doctor; "there lies the shadow of our good friend Wilkins, but it looks as if his substance had escaped us."

"But the thing moved," I cried—"the shadow did, at any rate—moved and disappeared."

The doctor stooped and lifted up the empty sleeve of the big ulster. There was a string tied around the sleeve, a string that led up through an empty stove-pipe hole and out in the corridor. We went out to see what the other end of it was attached to, and found that it was made fast to a bell wire, in such a way as not, probably, to interfere with the ringing of the bell.

We gazed at the thing curiously and, for the moment, without comprehending. Then the doctor hit upon a solution, which we afterward found to be the true one.

It was simple. "Like all great ideas," said he. "The first thing Wilkins did was to make fast a string between the gate and the old-fashioned bell pull in the front doorway. In that way he assured himself of getting a warning when your detectives returned from the fire. It wouldn't allow him much leeway, but he undoubtedly calculated that it would be enough. When this house was in its prime this third floor room served, no doubt, as quarters for a servant, and it was natural that one of the bells should ring up here. The thought of the dummy had probably occurred to him in advance, and it was a good thought. His chance of escaping your two men, when they returned, would be vastly greater if they should rush into the house with no other idea than that an intruder was sitting in Henry Morgan's study, leaning over Henry Morgan's desk.

"But the notion of connecting the dummy with the bell wire, and balancing it so that the slightest pull would cause it to move toward the light, and then disappear, must have been the inspiration of the moment."

"Well, he's gone," said Ashton, "and he's probably got the map, though if you know where you left it, you'd better look and see."

I pulled open the drawer where we had placed it, and glanced inside. One glance was enough. The map was gone.

"He can't have gone very far," said Ashton; "that's a safe surmise; and as long as we've got that girl to track him with, we'll get him yet. Come, there's no use loitering here."

Great Not All From World's High Places

Who would have expected that Goliath's antagonist would emerge from the quiet pastures? "Genius hatches her offspring in strange places." Very humble homes are the birthplaces of mighty emancipations, once said the late Doctor Jowett.

There was a little farm at St. Ives, and the farmer lived a quiet and unsensational life. But the affairs of the nation became more and more confused and threatening. Monarchical power despoiled the people's liberties, and tyranny became rampant. And out from the little farm strode Oliver Cromwell, the ordained of God, to emancipate his country.

There was an obscure rectory at Epworth. The doings in the little rectory were just the quiet practices of simple homes in countless parts of England. And England was becoming brutalized, because its religious life was demoralized. The church was asleep, and the devil was wide awake! And forth from the humble rectory strode John Wesley, the appointed champion of the Lord, to enthuse, to purify, and to sweeten the life of the people.

On what quiet farm is the coming deliverer now laboring? Who knows?—Exchange.

A Cutting Question

Lawrence Stallings, whose war experience—he lost a leg in France—has given him some excellent movie plots, was the guest of honor at a Los Angeles luncheon.

"I've seen one or two of your films," a visiting English novelist said to him over the coffee. "They weren't bad, you know. Crude, perhaps, but really not bad at all."

The Englishman stared at Mr. Stallings pensively. Then he went on:

"Do you know, I once thought of writing for the films myself, but"—and he gave a foolish laugh—"but friends dissuaded me."

"Friends of the films, do you mean?" said Mr. Stallings.

Had to See That Show

Henry Laird, arrested on a disorderly charge at Monessen, Pa., happened to remember after he had been put into a cell that there was a motion picture being shown that he wished to see. He reached through the bars, tested the lock and found it unfastened. He walked out of the jail and went to the show. His absence discovered, police began a search throughout the city for him. After the performance, Laird returned to his cell and was sleeping peacefully when the desk sergeant made a visit to the lockup.

The Moving Note

"What in the world do you think you're playing?" said the conductor testily to the trombone artist during a rehearsal.

"I'm sorry, sir. There's a fly crawling around on the page, and I keep playing him."

Embarrassing Position Experienced By Bronx Lady

Miss Jeanne Ginsberg, Bronx, N. Y., writes: "I had become accustomed to arising each day with a heavy head, dizzy and bad taste in my mouth. My bowels were frequently clogged and constipated. One day I became so sick to my stomach I had to leave an important job and go home. A friend advised me to take CARTER'S LITTLE LIVER PILLS. I feel greatly relieved since using them and whenever my stomach and head goes bad again I'll certainly know what to do."
CARTER'S LITTLE LIVER PILLS are sugar coated, small, easy to swallow, purely vegetable, and relieve the bowels free from pain. They tonic the system as they are purely vegetable and do not contain Mercury, Calomel or other poisonous drugs.
CARTER'S LITTLE LIVER PILLS, 25c. and 75c. red packages.

The BABY

Why do so many, many babies of today escape all the little fretful spells and infantile ailments that used to worry mothers through the day, and keep them up half the night?

If you don't know the answer, you haven't discovered pure, harmless Castoria. It is sweet to the taste, and sweet in the little stomach. And its gentle influence seems felt all through the tiny system. Not even a distasteful dose of castor oil does so much good.

Fletcher's Castoria is purely vegetable, so you may give it freely, at first sign of colic; or constipation; or diarrhea. Or those many times when you just don't know what is the matter. For real sickness, call the doctor, always. At other times, a few drops of Fletcher's Castoria.

The doctor often tells you to do just that; and always says Fletcher's. Other preparations may be just as pure, just as free from dangerous drugs, but why experiment? Besides, the book on care and feeding of babies that comes with Fletcher's Castoria is worth its weight in gold!

St. Paul—More than $200,000,000 worth of dairy products were produced in Minnesota in 1926, N. J. Holmberg, state commissioner of agriculture, announced. Dairy production showed a considerable increase over 1925, with prospects good for a continued increase in 1927 when figures become available.

Wheaton—Sportsmen of Wheaton and Traverse county, mecca for duck hunters for many years, are organizing in an effort to stop afternoon shooting, contending that if hunting was stopped at noon it would give ducks an opportunity to come into the lake and settle down, thus providing shooting for the following day.

South St. Paul—Eight steers fed at the University farm sold at South St. Paul for the highest price paid on the St. Paul market since war time. The eight head, averaging 1,144 pounds, brought $18 a hundredweight or an average of $205.92 a head.

Garver of the University of Minnesota and Miss Marguerite M. Wells, president of the state league of women voters will be speakers. President Glenn Frank of the University of Wisconsin will speak at an evening meeting on Thursday, December 1.

SALLY CARR felt like a naughty little girl having her own way when she told John Horner that he might see her home that cold, clear night in February. As usual, there were several of the young men who had expressed the hope that they might walk the two blocks with her that lay between her house and the clubhouse where those informal neighborhood dances were held twice a week all winter. There were Tom and Kendrick and Rodney. She knew that if she accepted the offer of any one of those three the other two, while in a measure disappointed, would have approved. They were birds of a feather, each in the estimation of the other a "regular fellow." But John Horner was a queer fish, to put it mildly. He read too much, studied too hard and loafed too little. Though the same age as the others, he had gone off to college two years before they were even through high school. He had even contrived to save enough money working in vacations to pay for six months abroad after he left college. Now he was working in a magazine office somewhere in the city and it was said that he had sold poetry and was writing a novel.

When Sally first danced with John that evening at the club she was a little embarrassed because she felt that she was taller than he. She felt relieved when she saw in a mirror at the end of the room that they were practically the same height. Still Sally wished that John were just a trifle taller. Tom, Kendrick and Rodney were all six feet or more. But when she sat talking with John after that first dance she forgot his stature.

He was telling her an amusing incident of his short stay in Algiers the summer before. Later they spoke of poetry—and Sally asked him if she might some time see something he had written.

"I'll recite it to you if you'll let me," said John.

He asked if he might walk home with her and she said he might.

"I'm glad," said John, "because I want to recite that poem to you. As a matter of fact, I wrote it to you. It's a funny sort of thing. I sold it, though, first thing. But I can't say it in here. I have to be outdoors."

Sally and John were among the first out of the clubhouse that sharp February evening. Deep ruts in the snow and a smooth glaze of ice over much of the road made motoring uncertain and almost all of the dancers chose to walk home.

Sally was aware that Kendrick walking with Rodney's sister and Tom walking with Kendrick's cousin with Rodney in tow were walking five abreast not far behind her. Apparently they found something very amusing to talk about. Sally blushed a little at the conviction that that something was the vision ahead of them, of herself and John walking up the icy hill.

She asked John to recite his poem. "But not too loud," she warned, "some one may be listening."

John began. It was really a rather nice bit of verse. Sally was too confused to hear much of the first four lines—and the last four she never heard, at least until several months later. But she did catch enough of them to know that they expressed ardent devotion—and Sally remembered that John had said he had written the lines to her. The hand of the poet holding her arm so firmly sent a strange thrill into Sally's young heart—and then, unexpectedly, the hold became tighter, painfully tight, and Sally felt suddenly that the slippery ground had been pulled out from under her. It seemed as if the cold sky above turned a sudden half circle and then she landed, but on something unexpectedly soft. When she came to a full realization of just what had happened it was to hear a chorus of rough guffaws and raucous ha ha's. Rodney, Tom and Kendrick were standing over her and so were Rodney's sister and Kendrick's cousin. And Sally realized as they looked down upon her that she was sitting squarely and firmly on John Horner's stomach.

"I'm sure I don't see anything to laugh at," said Sally, but apparently John did. At least as soon as he had scrambled to his feet he managed to join the others in their laughter. Kendrick suggested that one of the brave trio had better help John home—to keep him from slipping—while another had better walk on with Sally. "She might sit on you again," said Rodney. Sally looked at John. Standing there beside the others he looked very short—almost insignificant. Then she remembered the four lines he had begun to recite. Tears came into her eyes. "I think we can manage very well alone," Sally told the others. So they went on up the hill together, walking very gingerly, arm in arm.

"I won't try to go on with the verses," John told her. "Walking on ice and spouting poetry apparently don't go well together."

"But I think what I heard was very beautiful," Sally said.

John stood still and held her to him, looking straight into her eyes, that seemed like jewels in the faint starlight. "You know I love you," he said. "But after what happened, of course, you can only despise me. You were very, very kind not to send me off before the others."

"But I don't want to send you off," said Sally. "John—I love you."

Wood - Bids Are Opened

Fourteen bids were submitted to T. B. Folden, secretary of the local creamery board, on Monday for delivery of cordwood to the creamery here next year. Following are the names of those who were awarded the jobs and the number of cords each one will deliver: Ludwig F. Larson, 25; Dan Ness, 25; Melvin Nohre, 25; Ludwig M. Larson, 20; Arthur Larson, 20; Lloyd Knutson, 12; Gilbert Nelson, 10 cords.

These farmers will all bring green split poplar wood. Thorval Kolden was awarded a bid for 10 cords af spruce wood. The creamery board called for 175 cords, and the total amount of the accepted bids was 147 cords. The average price per cord to be paid for the poplar wood is $4.27. Mr. Kolden will receive $7.00 per cord for his spruce wood. The difference of 28 cords that the creamery bids did not cover, will be taken care of by some of those who took the smaller bids according to the way this matter has been handled in other years.

Rev. L. M. Redal Is New Pastor Here

Rev. L. M. Redal and family arrived here last Friday from Grand Forks to make their home here in the Lutheran parsonage. Rev. Redal was recently called to fill the pulpit of the Nazareth Lutheran church here, which was vacated last spring when Rev. Ordahl resigned as pastor here to accept a call as pastor for three congregations in N. D.

Rev. Redal has been spending the past two months here holding regular services and reviving the church work. He comes here highly recommended and states that he is very much pleased to become pastor of the local church and that he and his family can have the opportunity to make their home here at Holt.

The people of Holt and vicinity welcome Rev. and Mrs. Redal and family upon arrival here.

School Notes

Come to our Christmas Program which will be given in the School's Auditorium on Thursday evening Dec. 22 at 8 p. m.

Supt. Vieths spent his Thanksgiving vacation at his home near Red Wing. He made the trip by car.

Albert Larson returned home on Saturday from International Falls where he has been spending a few days looking for work. Mr. Larson reported that good jobs in that part of the country are scarce, and that the jobs that were open were not paying enuf to make your board.

Mail Christmas Gifts Early

When a legal holiday falls on a Sunday, the postal laws provide that all postoffices observe Monday as a holiday. Christmas and New Years come on Sunday, therefore there will be no deliveries on the following Monday. If letters and parcels are not delivered by Dec. 24th they will have to lay over until Dec. 27th.

Christmas parcels and letters should be mailed on or before Dec. 17th, and marked "Do not open until Xmas." It is a physical impossibility for the postoffice folks to handle all holiday mail in only one week. Mail early and avoid the rush.

Turkey Thieves Become Active

Turkey Thieves took the liberty last week to raid the turkey flock on the C. Rustad farm south of town. Mr. Rustad was gone a couple of nights last week, when he took two of his children to Warren where they have both undergone operations.

Mr. Rustad stated that eleven nice big turkeys were stolen out his flock which he has been feeding for the holiday market.

Whoever did the dirty work dealt the Rustads a hard blow as they have had all kinds of bad luck lately and feel that they need to sell their turkeys and receive something for them rather then to have some sneaky lowbrow steal them.

As far as we know this is the first turkey robbery committed around here this fall.

New Story Next Week

Watch for the big new story "Sylvia of the Minute" starting in the NEWS next week, Dec. 16. "Sylvia" is a story about those very estimable and interesting people, the Pennsylvania Dutch.

It has excellent characterizations and a fine vein of humor.

Important Notice!

A complaint has been made by officers of the Holt Postoffice that young men and girls attending school as well as others not attending school, gather at the Postoffice at distributing time of Mail as well as other times, making disturbance in a most disorderly manner. They have respectfully been warned, but to no avail. They have been known to open boxes belonging to other people than their own.

Any of the foregoing acts is a very serious offence, and if we should impose punishment for such act according to the statute and postal laws, Sec. 318, in which a Justice of the Peace officer is requested to do, and if we fail to do so, the postmaster can close the postoffice until we have done our duty. As Justice of the Peace I take this means to warn you that I will impose the full extent of the law.

A complaint has also been made that the Curfew Ordinance is not enforced, where children under a certain age are required to be home at 9 p. m., from Oct. 1st to April 1st, and not to be allowed to play upon the streets after this hour at night, like they have been doing. As my duty as the Justice of the town, I will see to it that this ordinance is enforced.

K. O. Flakne,
Justice of the Peace.

Mr. Backlund took a team of horses as part payment on the meat market. SHORT LESSONS IN DAIRYING

A series of 52 articles by Land O' Lakes Creameries and published by the Farmers Cooperative Creamery in the interests of its patrons.

LESSON IV.

There are 7 breeds of cows commonly used for dairying—Holsteins, Guernseys, Jerseys, Ayrshires, Brown Swiss, Milking Short Horns and Red Polls. The 5 breeds first mentioned are special dairy breeds and the latter 2 are dual porpose. All these breeds originated in Europe.

For a cow to be registered as pure-bred, she must be from pure-bred registered ancestry. Cows with 50 per cent or more of dairy blood are called high-grade cows. Cows with less than 50 per cent dairy blood, or of no particular breeding, are called common cows.

Good cows should go with good cooperative creameries. Good dairy herds can be built up through the use of good, pure-bred dairy sires. A farmer can make no better investment than in a pure-bred sire.

—19—

We went downstairs and out of the house in silence, and as we moved down the path we were instantly challenged by Mallory, who came running up to us.

"Where's Wilkins," he asked. "What have you done with him?"

"Lost him," said Ashton sourly.

"But he can't have got out of the house," protested Mallory. "I'm sure nobody has got out of the house."

"We've lost him, I tell you," said Ashton. "Can't you understand plain English?"

We all halted just then, and started, a little expectant. A man's footsteps were approaching, and the next moment he halted, rather undecisively, at the front gate. But seeing us, he turned in and came promptly toward us.

"Where's the car, gentleman?" he asked. "What have you done with the car?"

"What's that!" Ashton roared.

"The car—the automobile that I drove you out in! Where is it?"

For a moment there was no answer to that but silence. But the silence and the dismayed astonishment on our faces, gave the man his answer.

"So you went to the fire, did you?" said the doctor grimly.

"Not for more than five minutes," the man protested. "I thought I'd see if I could be of any help—"

The man's explanation trailed off volubly—protesting, incoherent, but we paid very little attention to it. We knew what had happened, all too well.

"Well," said the doctor, "if Wilkins only appreciated the fact, he owes us a large debt of gratitude. We told him about the map; and then we brought the girl out to him, and left her, together with an automobile for him to disappear in."

"He's better not try to thank me," said Ashton grimly, "until the score is settled. I'll get him yet."

"No," said the doctor, "I don't believe you will. Wilkins is playing in luck, perfectly unmerited good luck. And when you combine luck with the more solid and reliable qualities which Wilkins possesses, you get a result that is almost sure to be successful."

Ashton turned away impatiently.

"But the car!" the chauffeur cried. "I'm responsible for it. What am I to do?"

Ashton told him what he might do, in three or four short, explosive words.

CHAPTER XI

The doctor's prediction regarding the escape of Wilkins and the girl came true. It was all of twenty-four hours before the wires were working again; and the search, which could not fairly begin until that time, proved absolutely futile. The automobile was found next day, very early in the morning, standing in front of the Western station, the very place where we had started in it on our ride to Oak Ridge. But the oddly assorted pair, who must have driven back to town in it that night, disappeared as completely as if the earth had swallowed them up.

It was a long while before Ashton would admit the probability, or even the possibility, that he had lost them. Their escape must have rankled, for he never, voluntarily, spoke of the Oak Ridge affair, and he treated all reference to it, however indirect, in a manner which did not encourage discussion.

I think that, in his heart, Doctor McAllister found it impossible to be sorry that Wilkins had got off. It is one thing to know, as a matter of fact, that a man is a knave and that he richly deserves to be hung; but it is another thing to wish, devoutly, for such a consummation. We had liked Wilkins, and the strange, uncanny revelations regarding his past, which the doctor's merciless instruments had betrayed to us, were not strong enough to change that liking.

What we regretted most, in our discussions over the affair, was our fragmentary knowledge of it. One thing certain about it all seemed to be that we should never know.

But in that conclusion, strangely enough we were wrong. Only a few days ago (and it is now more than two years since the events I have here chronicled took place) the doctor came into my office waving a letter.

"Look at the handwriting first," he said, "and see if you can guess who it's from."

I took the thing in my hand, and frowned over it for a moment in complete perplexity. It was familiar, almost as familiar as my own, and yet I could not place it.

But as I gazed, some vague suggestion of delicate French potages and entrees came into my mind. I started, and dropped the letter on my desk.

"Not—not Wilkins!" I cried.

The doctor smiled broadly. "Read what he's got to say."

I needed no second invitation.

"Doctor McAllister.

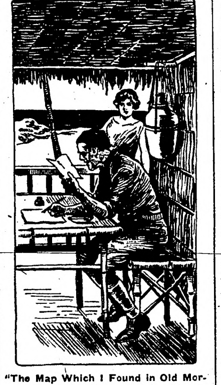
"Respected Sir: I have long intended to write to you to tell you how Jane Perkins and I are getting along, thinking you might be interested. I have taken up the white man's burden, as the poet says, and I find that it takes up most of my time, even though this island of mine is small (About ten square miles) and the population not numerous.

"Perkins and I (or Fanenna as she is called by her own people) are married and living very happy. Now that I am, in a sort, king here—trusting that you will pardon the liberty, sir—and obliged to make all the laws as well as enforce them, I am filled with regret for my former irregularities, though I may say that they have turned out well in the end.

"I did not murder Henry Morgan. Fanenna did, although she does not know it, and I would not tell her so for worlds. Perhaps I had better tell my story in order.

"Morgan was a villain and he deserved exactly what he got—if I may be allowed that opinion, sir. Circumstances may have justified him in killing Captain Franklin; indeed, there is no doubt that it had to be one or the other of them; and in robbing him of his money and his map, he only did what others, perhaps, would have done in his place. But he did an inexcusable thing, when he lodged an information with the authorities against the rest of us. The act was not necessary to his escape, for he could have got off scotfree anyway. But he wanted Franklin's treasure all to himself, and he thought if he could get us all hanged there would be none to dispute it with him. I found out in time what he had done, and I escaped; but the other poor fellows were caught and paid the penalty of their faith in a traitor.

"I went to America, but not in pursuit of Morgan. I did not know that he had gone there, and I wanted nothing more to do with him anyway, as I had decided to settle down and lead a respectable life. It pays just as well as the other and it's much more comfortable. This may surprise you, but it's true—I do not refer to the tips I earned as head waiter at The Meredith. That was not my trade so much as it was my recreation. In my youth I made the acquaintance of a palm reader and spiritualist, and this was the profession I took upon coming to your city. It was not long before I was able to organize this industry and to hire others to do the actual work. I supervised it all, and as head waiter at The Meredith, I was able to learn much about our smart people, which could be told to them again by palmists and mediums, with very good effect.



"The Map Which I Found in Old Morgan's House Was Worth All the Trouble It Cost Me to Get It."

"It was in this connection that I became acquainted with Jane Perkins. A medium I employed, whose apartment was not far from The Meredith, discovered her, and was using her trance states very effectively as a control. I got the greatest surprise of my life the first time I ever heard her talking Maori, a language which I understand and speak, as I suspect that you do also. From her talk I discovered that she was my old captain's daughter, and that she had inherited his secret. This was coming rather too close to home for comfort, as you will well understand, so I took her out of the spiritualist business, much as I regretted to do so, for she was very valuable, and got her employed as chambermaid at The Meredith.

"We were out walking together one day when her subjective state came over her without warning. She darted ahead of me, and I saw that she was tracking some one through the streets, by the scent. I followed her. Luckily it was dark, and we were not molested. She traveled very fast and overtook the person she was following, just as he was entering the Western station. I caught one look at him and saw that he was Henry Morgan.

"I succeeded in rousing her out of her state, for I did not want anything to happen just then and there. But I was determined to find where he lived and to get his map away from him. It did him no good, as there was neither latitude and longitude marked upon it, and this was the secret which Fanenna had told me.

"On the night when the unfortunate incident occurred which caused you and Mr. Ashton to interest yourselves in the case, we had gone out to Oak Ridge to make an attempt to secure the map. Nothing more than that, I assure you, sir. I had hypnotized her in order that she might lead me, by means of her extraordinary sense of smell, to the house where he lived, but she ran on ahead too fast for me to follow her. The crime was already committed, if you can call it a crime, before I reached the house.

"I tried to get her to go home with me, making no attempt to find the map at that time, but she was greatly excited and dangerous. So I was obliged to go away without her. I was unable to find her from that time, until she came back to The Meredith of her own accord, the day after she made her second visit to the Morgan house at the time when you were there.

"It was during my absence from the hotel, and without my knowledge, that she answered the advertisement for the cloak. Indeed, I did not know that she had done so, until you spoke to me concerning it that night at dinner. At that time it seemed safer to permit you to make the examination which you wished to make, than to try to prevent the examination from taking place, for she was now Jane Perkins, perfectly ignorant of everything connected with the affair.

"How you found out her true connection with it, as well as mine, I have no idea. I did not know you had done so, until I tore open the envelope in the hall and found it empty. Then I knew that it was time to act.

"There is one thing more, before I close, which you may think wants an explanation. I said just now that Fanenna did not know that she had killed old Morgan, and yet she is Fanenna rather than Jane Perkins, although she is not exactly either one of them. She is no longer subject to those trance states of hers, and her character seems to be a mixture of the two distinct persons which she was before that night when you took her out to Oak Ridge with you. Her memories of all her past are, I am thankful to say, extremely vague, though she remembers some things out of both of them. She can talk both Maori and English as well as I, and she says it is because when she was a Maori girl she heard a voice speaking to her in English, and ordering her to understand it. This seems great nonsense to me, but it may be that you will see some meaning in it.

"I will close by saying that the map which I found in old Morgan's house that night was worth all the trouble it cost me to get it, for it has made us very comfortable and well-to-do, and has made it possible for me to make many improvements on this island of mine. It is a very beautiful place, and with the comforts of civilization, which I have been able to add to its natural attractions, is a very good place to live.

"Fanenna wishes to be remembered to you and Mr. Phelps, and also to Mr. Ashton, whom she used to admire very greatly when she was chambermaid at The Meredith.

"I should enjoy a visit from you very much, but I fear it will be impossible, for reasons which you will doubtless understand, for me even to suggest such a thing. But please believe me, sir,

"Yours most gratefully and respectfully,

"WILKINS,
"Rona Island.

"P. S. You have seen a map of this island, or a part of it, and above is the name I have given it; but I must imitate the wisdom and discretion of my old chief, and omit to mention latitude and longitude."

The doctor met my eye as I laid the paper down. "You don't happen to know the latitude and longitude, do you, Phelps?" he asked, laughing.

"Do you?" I exclaimed, with a rather startled look into his twinkling gray eyes.

"Do you remember those queer syllables that Fanenna repeated to us that night when she told us her story, the syllables that neither she nor I understood?"

Then, mimicking her strange guttural voice (and I will admit that even now the mere sound of it made me shiver a little), he said, "Ouan feef, ti oues. Ten sout."

Over and over he repeated them, his smile growing broader and more tantalizing, as I still failed to understand. Then, all at once, I got it.

"One fifty west. Ten south!" I shouted.

"Not so loud," he said in mock alarm. "Ashton might hear you. And, on the whole," he added, smiling thoughtfully, but still half-seriously, "on the whole, I'd rather Ashton didn't know."

"You can show him the letter, at any rate," said I.

There came a knock at the door just then, a knock we knew.

"Come in," called the doctor. "Come in, Ashton. Here's a letter that may interest you."

Daily Gains for Calf

When properly fed, calves will make gains of one and a half or two pounds per day for the first four months. The purpose of feeding the dairy calf is to insure steady growth without fattening. Wild Ride on Deer

Friends vouch for the truth of the story told of Fred Rogers, a logger in the Marshfield (Ore.) district. He leaped on the back of a buck deer and rode it until it dropped exhausted. The deer was entering a river when Rogers mounted it, and it swam across with the double load. After a wild ride Rogers was able to get off and capture his prize.

Drugs Excite the Kidneys, Drink Water

Take Salts at First Sign of Bladder Irritation or Backache

The American men and women must guard constantly against kidney trouble because we often eat too much rich food. Our blood is filled with acids which the kidneys strive to filter out; they weaken from overwork, become sluggish, the eliminative tissues clog and the result is kidney trouble, bladder weakness and a general decline in health.

When your kidneys feel like lumps of lead; your back hurts or the urine is cloudy, full of sediment, or you are obliged to seek relief two or three times during the night; if you suffer with sick headache, or dizzy, nervous spells, acid stomach, or if you have rheumatism when the weather is bad, begin drinking lots of good soft water and get from your pharmacist about four ounces of Jad Salts. Take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast for a few days and your kidneys may then act fine.

This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to help flush and stimulate clogged kidneys, to neutralize the acids in the system so they no longer are a source of irritation, thus often relieving bladder disorders.

Jad Salts is inexpensive, cannot injure, makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink and belongs in every home, because nobody can make a mistake by having a good kidney flushing any time.

The champion father and mother as far as number of children is concerned is a subject for never-ending dispute. Whenever the head of a large family steps forward to claim such a title there is certain to be produced records of still larger families. Recently a German named Scheinberg was nominated as the champion father. He was supposed to have had 87 children—four quadruplets, seven triplets and 16 sets of twins—by two wives. But investigation failed to locate this prolific father or his family.

Medical literature contains accounts of women having nearly 50 children, but such cases are not generally accepted as authentic. About the most notable authenticated case was that of Dr. Mary Austin, a Civil war nurse, who claimed 44 children—13 sets of twins and six triplets. Despite this large family she is supposed to have found time to study medicine and get a doctor's degree.—Pathfinder Magazine.

The Promotion for Alice

By CORONA REMINGTON

(Copyright.)

ALICE MILLER looked like an elf as she sat on the old fallen log across the stream and dabbled her toes in the water, her lithe young body swaying slightly with the rythmic movement of her feet, her red lips puckered as she whistled a little tune to herself. She put out a brown hand and tried to catch the dappled shadows that danced across the log, her dress, her arms, the water. And quite happy she was as she sat there thinking her own pleasant thoughts. Out in this free world she could scarcely realize that she was Alice Miller who worked at Uptons in Carrway fifty weeks out of the year with only four walls of an office to look at from month's end to month's end.

The sound of a man's laughter nearby made her look quickly toward the bank of the stream and as quickly drop into the water and start for the opposite side.

"Oh, don't run away," begged Dr. Austin Taylor, his voice full of disappointment. "I'm not sure you're real. You looked so like a wood nymph sitting there playing with shadows. Come back, do, and I'll make believe I'm a satyr and play on my pipes for you."

"I don't entertain satyrs with my shoes and stockings off," she laughed, "but if you want to dreadfully, you might walk along my log and come over to my side and sit down and tell me all you've been doing today."

He followed her instructions to the letter, dropped on to some moss and leaned against an old cottonwood tree.

"This seems too good to be true," he sighed as he locked his arms around his knees.

Alice glanced at his sensitive, tired face and a quick feeling of sympathy swept over her.

"Poor Austin Taylor, you're all tired, aren't you? Did you call on lots of sick people this morning?" she asked.

"A good many. I've made over a hundred miles since five o'clock. A country doctor has his office in the whole country instead of in the proverbial hat. But I didn't want to talk about myself." He turned the conversation swiftly. "I wanted to talk about you."

"Oh, I've made up my mind I'm not going to be a stenographer another year. I'll get a promotion somehow. I want to do something bigger; men do such great fine things and . . . women can't," she ended, her eyes bright with earnestness.

"What an absurd idea. Alice, you've done the finest thing anyone could do by reinstating my faith in woman kind. I had almost decided that they were a crowd of fun-loving flappers without a serious thought in their heads."

"But that's just because you don't know them, Austin. When it comes to a crisis most of those very little flappers will prove themselves the most wonderful sports. The majority of the girls in my graduation class at high school were flappers but lots of them are married now and they make the best little wives. Maybe two or three years ago you'd have called me one, too. I used to paint and powder dreadfully and pluck my eyebrows. I was awfully extreme and I remember once Uncle John took me home and spanked me for rougeing my lips on the street. I was a freshman in high school then." Alice laughed at the reminiscence.

"And you seem so simple and sweet now," he mused incredulously.

"I hope I am," she answered a little warmly, rising to go, "and I think I've always been."

"Of course you are. Of course you were. I know you are!" he protested frantically, pulling her down to the ground again. "Oh, Alice, don't get offended. I love you so. It's only that I can't get . . . accumstomed to it. I suppose I've idealized my women too much."

He looked so pathetically perplexed and so dead in earnest that the girl felt sorry for him—just a bit.

"No sir," she laughed teasingly. "Trouble with you, is, you need to idealize your women a little more."

"I guess you're right," he admitted, "but flapper or not, Alice, will you marry me? That's doing something a lot bigger than just being a stenographer." He leaned over and put a trembling hand on hers. "Have I said something that hurt too much?" he asked. "Suppose I've ruined my whole future happiness with my fool ideas."

Alice hesitated a second then looked up at him, her frank eyes meeting his.

"Flapper and all," she said with an expression of mischief on her face. "I will. But that's a funny promotion. And now I'll race you to the house. Used to be on the track at school," and without waiting she jumped up and left the little stream and over the hill and across the meadow into the shadows they fled, their laughter floating behind them on the still summer air.

At the gate to the old home she stopped.

"This is a nice place under this big tree," she said shyly.

"You little minx," he laughed, taking her in his arms and kissing her. "I could have caught you long ago only I was afraid of hurting your flapper feelings or something."

EASY LESSONS IN AUCTION BRIDGE

Fourth Hand Bidding

AN original bid by fourth hand requires from one to one and a half quick tricks more than for dealer. Defensive and assisting bids by fourth hand follow practically the same rules as these bids made by second or third hands, but there is one particular fourth hand bid which must be given some attention; namely, that made in response to an informatory double.

Reviewing the conditions of an informatory double: Any double of one, two or three of a suit or one no trump made at the doubler's first opportunity and before his partner has bid, is considered an informatory double, and calls upon the partner for a bid.

A double of one of a suit says, in Auction Bridge language, "Partner, I have a no-trump hand in all but the suit doubled; if you have a good four-card major suit, please bid it, even in preference to a better five-card minor suit or a no trump; if you do not have such a major suit but have the doubled suit stopped twice, bid no trump; lacking both of these, please bid the better of your minor suits."

These instructions are explicit; and if third hand passes, fourth hand must never pass just because he has a poor hand. In fact, the poorer his hand is the more imperative is the necessity for a bid. The only situation which justifies a pass is when fourth hand holds such a strong hand in the suit doubled that he is certain of defeating the dealer's bid for a large penalty. A pass made under these conditions is called a business pass. Examples of fourth hand's response to partner's informatory double when one spade is doubled and fourth hand holds:

(1) S—x x x; H—A J x x; D—A K Q x x; C—x. Two hearts.

(2) S—A J x; H—x x x; D—A x x x; C—K J x. One no trump.

(3) S—x x x; H—10 x x x; D—x x x; C—x x x. Two hearts.

(4) S—x x; H—x x x; D—A x x x; C—x x x x. Two diamonds.

(5) S—x x x x; H—x x x; D—x x x; C—x x x. Two hearts or two spades.

No. 5 is an extreme case and needs drastic treatment. If you hold such a hand when your partner is just an ordinary player you should bid two hearts and pray that the dealer will bid over you, but if you have a real live thinker for a partner, bid two spades. He will at once scratch his head and say to himself, "What's this? My partner certainly does not want to play spades; if he did, he would pass and let the original dealer play one spade doubled. He cannot have a hand to help me or he would have bid it; therefore, he must have a 'bust' hand with four worthless spades and is making that bid so that I may take myself out."

The doubler would therefore understand the situation and bid something if the dealer passed or doubled.

Fourth hand's response to partner's double of one no trump should be governed by these same rules. He must bid (after a pass by third hand) unless holding a very strong hand, and should choose a four-card major in preference to a much better five-card minor.

If third hand bids after second hand has doubled, fourth hand is relieved from the necessity of bidding and should do so only when his hand fully warrants an assist.

Pre-emptive Bids

A pre-emptive bid has been defined as a bid which is higher than necessary and made for the purpose of shutting out a bid from the opponents. Unless desiring to pre-empt, every original bid should be for one odd trick. The former practice of making an original bid of two to indicate a long suit without top honors, a suit with four honors, or a no trump with four aces, has been given up entirely by the best players.

The occasions for pre-emptive bidding are when holding one very strong suit with great weakness in one or more of the other suits. Pre-empting in one major usually is done only when very weak in the other major; while great weakness in any suit may make a pre-emptive bid in a minor desirable.

A pre-emptive bid in spades should be three or four, and in any other suit four or five, as anything less frequently is apt to stimulate bidding rather than prevent it. To determine how high to make such a bid, it is well to count the sure tricks and add one or two to come from partner, but always bid the full strength of the hand at once. Examples:

(1) S—A K Q 10 x x x; H—x x x; D—A x; C—x. Four spades.

(2) S—K; H—A K Q J x x x; D—K x; C—A K x. Five hearts.

(3) S—A Q x; H—A K Q J x x; D—x x; C—x x. One heart.

(4) S—x; H—x x; D—A K Q J x x x; C—A K x. Five diamonds.

Greatest Factor in Man's Upward Climb

Heredity counts, of course. But against every example I could cite of innate connection between performance and physical inheritance, I would cite all human history as evidence that social, cultural and physical environmental factors set the stage for every human act. Man became human not because he was born that way but because he learned to act like a human being. The first years were the hardest. It probably took him 50,000 years to learn to talk; you learn in a few months; you can learn more words in ten years than the cave-man had in his dictionary. But we never have been able to paint a better buffalo than he could.—George A. Dorsey, in Cosmopolitan.

Rapid Seeding

Harold Saunders, a rancher and airplane owner in southern Oregon near Memford, recently planted ten acres of land to winter blue grass, using his airplane. This grass, peculiar to this country, grows from a bulb and it is tossed on the ground and left to mature in the winter and spring. The land was seeded in a few minutes.

Fur-Bearing Animals Increasing Rapidly

That fur-bearing animals are increasing rapidly in this territory, has been shown this Fall by the number of wolves, skunks, minks, and weasels which local trappers have caught since the trapping season opened. Old-timers here believe that the reason for so much game is that, in the past few years many of the hunters and trappers have quit using poison.

About ten years ago a few fellows here were using poison to kill wolves with, and this resulted in the killing of smaller game and birds. One old timer reports that only a few years ago hardly a single skunk could be found in this community and game birds were very scarce. Over fifty mink, several wolves, skunks, and weasels, have been killed around here this fall by local sportsmen who have been out shooting and trapping the animals. We don't mind the public taking game birds and animals when the hunting and trapping seasons are open, but leave a few for seed, and when the seasons are closed, help protect the animals and birds that they may increase and affore more sport the next time the season for taking them opens.

This month we find Oscar Erickson's name fourth on the list. I find that this is the first time Oscar's name has appeared among the first five on the list. Here's wishing you good luck, Oscar, and we hope you'll top the list!

October is a rather slack month yet we find some over sixty delivering more than 100 lbs. of butterfat.

All of you no doubt have read the Land O' Lakes articles published in the creamery's ad. space in the Holt Weekly News. These are mighty interesting. Even tho you read them now, I believe it would be worth your while to cut them out and keep them where you can lay your hands on them at any time. Before the 52 weeks are up, I venture to say that the topic of dairying will be well covered, and then is the time to check up by reading the articles which you are keeping for future reference.

At this time of the year we have more or less trouble with frozen cream. This can be avoided to a certain extent by finding a place at home where the cream will not freeze, and covering same while driving to town with it. Frozen cream makes greasy butter, and it is impossible to get an accurate test from frozen cream. Bear this in mind during the cold winter months. We often find cream that has been frozen and thawed out again before it is taken to town. The minute you thaw out frozen cream you will find that fat kernels are formed, which not only makes your testing more or less guesswork, but our cream strainer is absolutely clogged up from five gallons of such cream, and from then on the cream will run over the top of the strainer and if you are not very careful some of it might run on the floor before you are aware of the mess. If your cream is frozen before you leave home, which you should not have, then bring it to us frozen rather than to thaw it out yourself.

Feed flavors are noticed at this time of the year, especially so from silage and dairy feeds containing molasses and different kinds of weed seeds. Usually this can be overcome by feeding same from 2 to 4 hours before milking. To be positively sure, it is best to feed after milking. If it is possible to deliver your cream before one o'clock p. m., it will be very much appreciated.

No cream will be taken in on the Monday after Christmas and the Monday after New Year's day. We will take in cream on Tuesdays of those two weeks instead on Monday. Friday will be cream day as usual, but the reason for changing from Mondays to Tuesdays those two weeks is because Monday is observed as a holiday when Christmas and New Year's day fall on Sunday.

School Notes

Harold Nohre returned to school on Monday after a week's absence due to infection in his hand which occurred after a fall on some ice on the school grounds.

The second science table which was purchased this fall by the school to match the one purchased last year, has been completely installed. This certainly adds to the convenience of the work in the science room and it also adds much to the appearance of the room. When you visit our school do not forget to visit the most interesting room in the building. We leave it to the visitor to decide which room this is.

Come to our Christmas Program which will be given in the School's Auditorium on Thursday evening Dec. 22 at 8 p. m.

Our school received forty dollar's worth of Christmas seals to sell. According to incomplete reports, they are almost all disposed of. Last year we sold twenty four dollars and sixty cents worth of these seals. Help us pass this mark. Use Christmas seals on all your packages and letters this Christmas.

The seats in the High School assembly room have been re-arranged over the week end. There are now six seats in each row and five rows. In these there are only two vacant seats. It looks like room will be moved to some other place next year.

Work on the Christmas program is progressing nicely. Don't forget the date, Thursday evening, December 22, at 8 p. m.

Our school will close Thursday, December 22, there being no school on Friday of that week. In Nineteen Hundred Twenty-Eight school will resume on the Monday after the second Sunday, at the usual hour.

A CHRISTMAS SEAL GIFT

That she might walk and play like other girls has been the one gift that six year old Mary, patient at Glen Lake sanatorium, Hopkins, has asked from Santa Claus for many years. At last this wish has come true and the little legs, for three years tightly held in casts that tuberculosis of the bones might be cured, have been restored to usefulness.

To find other tots, who if denied proper treatment may go through life cripples, Christmas Seal funds bring free orthopedic clinics to all parts of the state. Over 500 of such children were examined this year and a number of them are now under treatment at the Gillette State Hospital for Crippled Children.

SHORT LESSONS IN DAIRYING

A series of 52 articles by Land O' Lakes Creameries and published by the Farmers Cooperative Creamery in the interests of its patrons.

LESSON V.

BAD FEED FLAVORS: Such feed as rye and rape pasture, cabbage, rutabagas, sour silage and various weeds, especially French Weed, give a bad flavor to milk, cream and butter.

Butter affected with these feed or weed flavors may be cut from 2 to 6 points on score, or from 1c to 3c per pound in price.

Feed that affects the flavor of milk and butter should always be fed after milking. The worst results are from feeding 1 to 5 hours before milking.

French Weed produces an onion or garlic flavor. It may come from the weed in pasture, hay or mill feed made from screenings containing the French weed seed. Look out for French Weed—it is causing increasing great loss to dairymen.

Always consult the buttermaker regarding the quality of your cream. He knows the probable cause of off flavors in cream and will be pleased to tell you now to remedy them.

POWERFUL INDIAN TRIBES DISAPPEAR

War, Disease and Intermarriage Cut Roster.

Enid, Okla.—War, disease and intermarriage have swept away many once-powerful Indian tribes and are reducing others to mere wraiths of their former might.

George Rainey, authority on Indian history, finds time rapidly adding to the roster of lost tribes, many of which are remembered chiefly because their names have passed to cities and towns in the region where once they roamed.

The Tonkawas, once disdained by other Indians, who accused them of cannibalism, have been reduced to about 26 members. They dwell near a town of that name in Oklahoma. The Kichai, for whom a small town near Wichita, Kan., was named, are gone. So are the Natchez, for whom the Mississippi city was named; the Biloxi Indians of southern Mississippi; the Mohegans; the Pamunkeys; the Pequota; the Pedees; the Ktchagames; the Mobilians, for whom Mobile was named; the Wacos, whose name Waco, Texas, bears, and many another stalwart tribe of red men.

Of these vanished tribes the Natchez have a particularly tragic history, Rainey relates in a forthcoming book. The French found them living near the future site of Natchez in 1682. Numerous conflicts with the French cost the Indians dearly, one of the most sanguinary fights taking place in 1772, when the right of the French governor to occupy the site of one of their principal villages as a plantation was contested.

The French swept down upon the tribesmen with musket fire and sword, killing large numbers at Fort Rosalie, Miss. With the Choctaws, the foreigners later attacked the remaining warriors and almost exterminated them.

A remnant of the band took refuge on Cicily island in the Mississippi river, near the mouth of the Washita river, and here again the French set upon them, killing many and selling others into slavery in Santo Domingo. Some of the red men fled to the Chickasaw country in South Carolina, afterward moving to the Cherokee country in Georgia. Gradually their numbers dwindled and their language and traditions passed. Their tongue had ceased to be spoken in 1800, Rainey says.

"Vital Egg" Decides Your Size, Is View of Doctor

Stockholm.—A formula for the growth of the human organism is the sensational discovery just announced here by Dr. Gaston Backman, Swedish physician, whose announcement has caused a furore in scientific as well as lay circles.

The size of human beings as well as their physical characteristics which now distinguish the various races are all determined by what he calls the vital egg and are not dependent to any great extent upon external influences. Thus, he dispels the belief that the offspring of the wealthy, due to better nourishment, are inclined to be taller than the offspring of the poor.

Simultaneously with the sudden appearance of Dr. Gaston Backman in the scientific limelight, his brother, Dr. Louis Backman, has stepped to the fore with the announcement that he is leaving for the United States for the purpose of studying pedagogic methods as well as the co-operation between medicine manufacturers and public hospitals for the purpose of eliminating excessive private profit.

Doctor Backman's American visit is expected to be the first step in a widespread reform among Swedish medical schools. His visit will be in the nature of an official mission.

Italy Reorganizes Its Entire Consular Service

Rome.—Italy has just completed a reorganization of her entire consular service, a reform unattempted since the foundation of the kingdom.

Forty new consulates have been created in places where before there were no representatives of Italy.

A considrable number of consulates have been raised to consulates general, while many honorary consuls, often persons of non-Italian nationality, have been supplanted by regular consuls belonging to the service.

Graven Initials Mark Old Trysting Place

Topeka, Kan.—The tokens of many a Nineteenth-century romance are graven in stone at the crest of Burnett's mound tallest hill in the vicinity of Topeka.

Initials, always in pairs and accompanied by figures representing dates, are carved by the score in the big bowlders until room scarcely remains for more inscriptions.

Dozens of initials and dates indicate romances which blossomed between 1880 and 1900, but few can be found bearing dates since 1910. Modern lovers apparently do not take time to walk from the base of Burnett's mound up its steep slopes to the summit, or if they do they do not record their trysts in stone.

ANCIENT ELEPHANT FOUND IN NEBRASKA

Giant Tusker Built on Lines of Steam Shovel.

Omaha, Neb.—They've found a new elephant out here in Nebraska. Dr. Henry Fairfield Osborn, famous paleontologist of New York, says it's a real discovery and that nothing like it has ever been found before.

The new elephant is built along the lines of a steam shovel. Its great tusks extend straight out in front and the ends are shaped just like a shovel. These tusks extend from the lower jaw and from the joint they measure seven feet. The length of the lower jawbones of the largest mammoth elephants heretofore known is less than two feet.

Dr. E. H. Barbour, head of the paleontological department of the University of Nebraska, and curator of the university museum, says the animal walked the earth some 1,000,000 or 2,000,000 years ago.

Dug Up in Nebraska.

This particular type of elephant, which has been named "Amedelodon Fricki," used to roam the Nebraska plains. The individual skeleton has just been found in Frontier county, this state, and is now in the museum of the University of Nebraska. Only the lower jaw, the huge tusks, tremendous teeth, still in place in the jawbone, a rib and a toe bone have been found, but the expedition from the University of Nebraska is now searching Frontier county for other traces of the big fellow who carried a spade like a steam shovel out in front of him as he walked.

The ends of the two tusks are set very close together, making practically a broad, straight continuous line across the end where the "spade" comes in contact with the earth. The huge molars measure nine inches long and are still firmly set in the jawbone. These molars are in perfect condition, and the tusks have the density and other marks of true ivory. The specimen is perfect. It will be mounted in the Nebraska university "hall of the elephants," which scientists say is the greatest collection of prehistoric elephants, mammoths and mastodons in all the world. Practically all the specimens in this collection, except several modern elephants, were discovered in Nebraska.

The gigantic combination of steam shovel and animal just discovered tilled the Nebraska prairies and turned the sod over with as perfect an ivory shovel and plow as can be imagined. In the days that the big fellow roamed the earth Nebraska was either the shores of an ocean or was a great inland sea. The "steam shovel" was used to turn the sod, dig up food such as seaweed from beneath the waters, or for excavating in mud or loose earth and sand in its search for food.

Mystery About Tusks.

The end of the jawbone proper into which the heavy tusks are set is a comparatively light bone, seeming not nearly strong enough to stand the heavy strain which might be supposed to have been exerted in the heavy digging of which the shovel tusks would be capable. This peculiarity makes something of a mystery out of the use of the tusks. Doctor Barbour hazards the guess that as the great mammoth dug, he wrapped his trunk around the "shovel" in the heaviest part and that this took most of the strain off the jawbone.

"The shovel-mastodon," says Doctor Barbour, "must have carried his head high in order that the protruding mandible could clear the ground when it walked, and not interfere with progression. Fortunately our specimen is perfect. The tusks have the whiteness and the density, as well as the decussating lines of ivory. The bones are white and firm and the molars almost unblemished."

The shovel-tusks extend from the lower jawbones in this elephant, while in other elephants the tusks extend from the upper jaw. Doctor Barbour makes a guess that the upper tusks may have been dwarfed or possibly aborted altogether in this new mammoth.

First indications of the presence of the fossil remains of the big "shovel" tusker were reported to the university by A. S. Keith of Freedom, Frontier county, and a geological expedition was sent to that county to search for other remains. It was this expedition that gathered the lower jaw, the tusks and molars, the ribs and the toe bone. It is hoped that additional remains will eventually be found of the "steam shovel" elephant.

Orange Juice Ousts Lime in British Navy

London.—The British seaman has lost his traditional name. Jack is no longer a "limey."

The admiralty has changed the ration of lime juice—given to sailormen since time immemorial to prevent scurvy—and is now giving a daily portion of orange juice. The lime juice was always dealt out with a rum ration, but now the sailor must take his orange straight.

"Oranges possess more vitamines C—the "bottled sunshine," said an admiralty spokesman. "It is also less bulky and cheaper. The navy spends about £9,000 sterling a year for lime juice. It is also heavily fortified with rum. But orange juice will be given plain."

Jack wants to know what becomes of the rum.

WOMAN, 75, GUIDE OF 3,100 SEMINOLES

Mrs. Davis First of Sex to Be Tribal Chief.

Wewoka, Okla.—Mrs. Alice B. Davis, first woman chief of an Indian tribe, now is the seventy-five-year-old "guide, philosopher and friend" of 3,100 Seminole tribesmen, whom she ruled for two brief periods in 1922.

She frequently appears in the District court here as an interpreter in litigation involving the oil lands of the Seminoles.

Her father, John F. Brown, a Scotch physician and graduate of the University of Edinburgh, had come to the United States as a surgeon during the Civil war. At that time he married Lucy Red Beard, a Seminole.

A son became chief of the tribe and won the title of "Governor" Brown. After the latter's death, his sister Alice was appointed by President Harding to serve as chief for one day in order to complete business which her brother had left unfinished. A month later she was reappointed in order to sign authoritatively a deed in behalf of the Seminole nation. The deed called for the transfer of Emahaka mission to a private individual.

A school for Seminole girls, the mission had been condemned and abandoned and the federal government wished to dispose of it. Mrs. Davis refused to sign the deed. She contended that the land had been sold without the consent of the tribe and that the Indians received no part of the purchase price. For her refusal she was immediately "separated" from her position as chief of the tribe.

Her retirement to private life by no means lessened her activities. She keeps a record of births, deaths and marriages among her people and is always prepared to supply information to a fellow Seminole who wishes to prove his claim to oil rights.

The federal government has sent Mrs. Davis to Florida three times in the last generation to act as interpreter in trials involving Seminoles.

After being educated in Indian missions, the daughter of the Scotch physician and the Seminole maiden became the wife of a white man, George Davis. She is the mother of eleven children.

Had Alphabet 10,000 Years Ago, Stone Shows

Vichy, France.—That man possessed a definite alphabet 10,000 years ago, apparently has been established by the finds made by the International Commission of Scientists investigating the excavations at Glozel, near here. Controversy over the authenticity of the supposedly neolithic remains developed last September when Rene Dussaud, conservator of the Louvre museum, said that the implements and bones were "planted" at Glozel less than twenty years ago and probably as a hoax.

The anthropological congress which heard his charges then took up the appointment of a committee to determine the authenticity of the find. The scientists began digging after taking precautions against fraud. At first they found nothing. But later, in a field believed to be the site of a neolithic cemetery, they unearthed a piece of polished stone. This showed a drawing of a deer and six distinctly engraved characters of the disputed Glozel alphabet and a red clay idol, on which the Glozel death mask—a face without a mouth—was visible.

Ex-Kaiser Buys Island in Lake Maggiore

London.—A Geneva dispatch to the Daily Express says that the former German kaiser has bought two small islands in Lake Maggiore, facing Locarno, Switzerland. One island is to be rechristened "Island of the World's Peace." It is reported that the ex-kaiser intends to build a winter residence there. The purchase for £14,000 (roughly $70,000) was effected by the ex-kaiser's business manager, Baron Von der Rheldt.

Invents New Lens to Take Colored Movies

Pittsburgh, Pa.—Using only a special lens attachment for ordinary cameras, a new motion picture optical color process was demonstrated here recently for the first time.

The process was invented by Harold N. Cox of Pittsburgh, formerly connected with the Edison Research Laboratories.

Cox said the new process calls into use "a simple lens attachment which can be placed on any camera." The pictures taken, he asserted, can be "developed in any laboratory fitted to turn out the ordinary motion picture, printed on black and white stock, neither tinted nor toned, or in any way artificially colored, with regular printing equipment, and projected on any projector or by again using similar lens attachment or shown on any screen."

The process according to its inventor can reproduce any color or shade that the eye can perceive.

Cox claims that with his invention, color films can be produced with no increase in cost over the present black and white method.

Gets $20.00 Extra for Turkeys

MODERN METHODS in all lines are supplanting the old ways.

Formerly farmers almost invariably sold their poultry alive, or if they dressed the poultry they sold it at home often to a General Store who seldom was as well posted on market conditions as the farmer is today.

THE PETER FOX SONS COMPANY, 1122 Fulton Street, are contacting with more than 65,000 poultry raisers thruout the country—advising them on market conditions, instructing them on how to properly prepare for market, where to ship, etc.

THE PETER FOX SONS COMPANY have thousands of letters testifying to the excellent returns and extra profit received from them.

Read this one.

O. G. Johnson, Hinsdale, Montana, writes: "Last year I gained $20.00 on 14 Toms by shipping to you. That is $20.00 more than local man offered—so I shall pass him up again and ship to you."

If you have turkeys, poultry, or veal to ship—ship direct to THE PETER FOX SONS COMPANY, CHICAGO, where you are guaranteed the top market price of day of arrival for kind and grade of poultry less 5% and transportation charges.

Ship or write them today. This firm has net resources of more than three-quarter million dollars.—Adv.

Airplane Helps Ranch Manager Direct Work

The first plantation to be "bossed" from the air, says the New Orleans Times-Picayune, is a 6,500-acre ranch in Tulare county of southern California. By means of an airplane the entire place is kept mapped by aerial photography, so that progress and needs in the various fields and sections may be handled from the main office without the need of constant visits, inspections and reports.

The ranch keeps 500 men employed and it is of the utmost importance that their labor be directed with the minimum of friction and duplication. The pictures, taken from as high as 9,000 feet, give comprehensive views of crop progress and without moving from his seat in the ranch house, but by glancing over the aerial map, the manager can make daily assignment of his men to the various parts of the work.

Railroads No Longer Yield to King Frost

Special snow-fighting locomotives have been adopted this winter by several Eastern railroad yards to clear the switches of snow, reports Popular Science Monthly. The engines are equipped with nine pipes, arranged in a "V" just behind the cowcatcher, to spurt live steam directly beneath it and melt the hardest snow and ice. One large railroad has 25 of its locomotives equipped for this duty.

Another way of keeping switches clear of snow is that recently adopted by a New York elevated railroad. It has built into the switch rails automatic electric heating coils that operate whenever the temperature falls below a certain point.

Horse Saved Companion

The spectacle of a young horse towing an old companion through the flood waters near Burlington, Vt., was witnessed by refugees on higher ground, according to an Associated Press dispatch. As the horses struggled, the old horse finally began to falter, slowed up and started to sink. The young horse, swimming beside him, paused as if uncertain what to do. Suddenly the black head reappeared above the crest of the flood and the old animal set his teeth in the young gray's mane. With a mighty tug the young horse started again for the bank, towing his exhausted companion. At last he reached shallow water and human friends drew both animals ashore.

Toy Balloon Went Far

A tiny toy balloon made a 300-mile air "hop" in three days. The craft took the air one Saturday night, according to its owner, O. C. Inman of Nashville, Tenn. Inman tied a slip of paper to the balloon asking the finder to write to him. After a week had gone by, Inman received a letter from Hubert Mitchell of Lavonia, Ga., 300 miles away. It read: "I found a balloon about one mile out of Lavonia one afternoon with your address on it. It had a small hole in the bottom and looked as if it had been melted by heat. It came down at sundown in a pasture."

Quite Simple

Mae—You really made over that dress yourself?

June—Yes; you remember that orchid handkerchief with the pink embroidered edge, don't you? Well, that is it.

Singer's Reply

Stories about John McCormack continue to drift in. It seems that when the tenor returned from Europe last time, reporters met him at the pier and told him that Deems Taylor was writing another "command opera" for the Metropolitan.

"Is that so?" said McCormack, much interested. "And what will this one be about?"

"A well known commercial subject," returned one of the reporters.

"Ah," said McCormack, smiling, "Otto Kahn?"—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

CHAPTER I

—1—

He did not know whether to be more amused or irritated at her temerity, not to say impudence, in keeping him waiting. He glanced at his wrist watch. Ten minutes past the time for their rendezvous and he had been here five minutes ahead of time. Waiting fifteen minutes—for a common little Pennsylvania Dutch girl! Really, she must be taught better. He would have to give her a lesson.

Hitherto it had been he who had kept her waiting here at their trysting place. Deliberately. To keep her in her place. Lest she get it into her head that he wanted to marry her! Any girl might expect anything these days—all social barriers falling, no lines drawn—

She was not, as yet, spoiled. She had never presumed to resent his keeping her waiting. Regarded him with awe. Demure little thing she was—

He considered how he should impress upon her the seriousness of the fact that she had displeased him. Go home and not be here when she did finally get here after walking three miles to meet him? No, he couldn't be quite so ruthless as that. Anyway, she would just think he had failed to keep their rendezvous and would not know he had been here and had gone away again.

Leave a note pinned to the tree? Not safe. Even if he did not sign his name. Commit yourself to writing and you're apt to have a lawsuit for damages or "heart balm" on your hands. Above all things he must avoid a scandal—just now especially—on the eve of becoming engaged—

Well, one thing was certain, she must not know he had been so eager as to have gotten here ages ahead of her and so forbearing as to have waited all this time. He'd hide and not appear until after she arrived.

Picking his way to avoid mud, he descended the hill on the slope opposite the one she would ascend.

He found himself surprised that he should be taking all this trouble for a little country girl. Unprecedented in his experience. Never, even for one of his own class, had he put himself out and he was nothing if not a stickler for "class" in these days of falling barriers. First time in his life he had ever been so lured by a girl of low breeding. A Pennsylvania Dutch farmer's daughter who talked the lingo—heavens! How on earth was it that he, usually too pernickety-nice, he admitted it, found the vulgar little thing so irresistible?

Ah, but the fact was she wasn't vulgar, really; only unsophisticated. If she were inherently vulgar, the gum-chewing type, he would not be here. No, not for all the seduction of that white throat so tantalizingly exposed when she bent back her head and laughed; and that unutterable sweetness of her lips; and the dazzling whiteness and evenness of her teeth; and that musical little gurgle when anything amused her. (And such unexpected things did amuse her, like his correcting her English and her manners.)

She puzzled him a little; had from the first; he did not "get" her exactly; something there was about her—it could not be subtlety, she was too simple. But he vaguely sensed that she was not quite so simple as she seemed; vaguely distrusted her; she did, sometimes, with an innocence that was almost suspiciously stupid, say such pointed things; things that did prick beneath the skin a little.

Youthfully priding himself upon his extreme modernism, and upon being a disciple of French decadent critics of art and life, he believed that he, in common with all the new generation who did any thinking, had rejected all religion. But the truth was that in the face of the wreckage of faiths all over the landscape, he did most tenaciously and devoutly cling to the faith of his fathers—their deeply religious faith in the respectability of the Creighton family and its divine right to special prerogatives—the prerogatives naturally inherent in owners of anthracite coal mines.

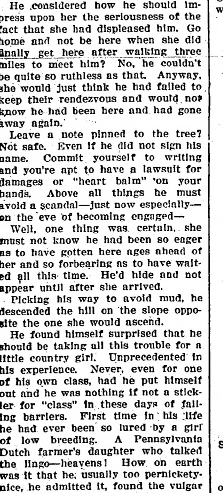
St. Croix Creighton was glad that he looked much more like a man of letters than a man of business. He cultivated that "literary" look he thought he had; and he did have a good deal to go on—clear-cut features, cold, thoughtful eyes, a rather Byronic head.

Had he not been so well placed in life as always to command consideration, he would hardly have "got by" so smoothly as he did with his little assumptions of superiority and his little affectations. But as no one of his world had ever had the temerity to consider him ridiculous, he did not know he was. To be sure, there was his elder brother, Marvin, who sometimes waxed sarcastic at his expense—but Marvin, in the judgment of his own class, was not a person to be taken seriously, for the obvious reason that he did not take himself nor his great position in the world nor yet the Creighton family itself seriously.

All this is, however, digressing—we have left our young gentleman standing uncomfortably and perilously on the muddy slope of a hill, taking in the view.

His gaze sought out in the distance the red brick farmhouse set down in the midst of Sam Schwenckton's prosperous acres—the home of the girl for whom he waited; its ugliness softened by distance. Did she, he wondered, feel its ugliness? He had tried once to rouse her to some enthusiasm over the wonderful view from the hilltop and all he had been able to elicit from her had been, "The vee-you? Yes, it's nice." A "nice" view! So of course, far from feeling the ugliness of her father's farmhouse, she was probably proud of its fresh paint and generally well-to-do aspect.

From where he stood St. Croix could plainly see, five miles to the right of the Schwenckton's' farm, his own home, rising from a hilltop, overlooking a wide area: the imposing estate, "Beechlands," that for two generations had been the home of the powerful Creighton family, visible from all points of the compass for many miles. And in the valley at the foot of their hill clustered the monotonous rows of ugly little houses in which the men and children lived who worked in the Creighton coal mines, creating the wealth which maintained the mansion on the hilltop, and at the same time, under a wise and beneficent Providence, earning their own subsistence, however bare and joyless—such was Nature's divinely ordained plan, the Creightons had always reverently and devoutly believed, and no religious believers had ever lived up to a creed more faithfully and consistently.



St. Croix Creighton Was Glad That He Looked Much More a Man of Letters Than a Man of Business.

Our young heir to the great Creighton estate, as he started on his way back to the appointed meeting place, decided that if Meely (that was her silly name—"Meely") were not there this time he would certainly go home.

"And," he told himself as he lit a cigarette and began his second ascent of the hill, "if I do go home without seeing her, she'll surely pay the piper!—if I don't decide to drop her altogether!"

He had an uneasy suspicion that this latter course would not hurt her nearly so much as it would fret him—though it had been she that had made the first advances in their intimacy; at a barn dance in the neighborhood of his home; outraging the rural conventions in her determination to attract his attention by boldly executing a dance solo down the length of the barn, stopping before him with a deep curtsey and holding out her lovely arms in invitation—after which he had danced with no one else during the remainder of the evening.

She had tried that evening to pin him down to a date for their next meeting, but though he had fully intended to meet her again, he had kept her in suspense; not only for that evening, but for two weeks following. Uncertainty—that was the weapon for winning and holding a girl.

He had confidently expected her to try to seek him out. But when a whole week had passed without a sign from her, he had begun to grow restless. Each succeeding day and night that he waited grew longer, intolerably longer, and he had finally realized, with an ironical amusement at his own expense, that all the "uncertainty" he had meant to inflict upon her, he himself was enduring with a poignancy that astonished and angered him. A little hussy like that, a peasant girl, play fast and loose with him, causing him sleepless nights, hungry yearnings to see her again and hold her, fresh and fragrant young beauty that she was, in his arms again, as he had ecstatically done at the barn dance!

But the trouble had been that he did not know where she lived nor even her name. So sure had he been that he would hear from her in a day or two that he had not taken the trouble to ascertain these unimportant facts about her.

It had been only when, quite beaten, he had been about to give in and try to discover her that he had received from her a funny, crude little note. What sport he had at his club showing it around for the enjoyment of his fellow club members!

"Since you are the only Gentleman Frend I got that's a purfect Gentleman in whom I feel I know well enought to ask for such a favur, dear, I am asking you, now, to keep company with me and be my Steady Date."

That was a month ago and he had been seeing her several times a week, furtively, ever since; his "ridiculous infatuation," as he scornfully called it to himself, growing more irresistible with each meeting.

As he reached the top of the hill he was greatly relieved (and thrilled) to see her sitting there under the tree which was their appointed meeting place.

At sight of him she threw away the apple she had been eating with greedy abandon, drew the back of her hand across her mouth and hastily rose.

His peculiar sort of egotism derived an almost sensual pleasure from this girl's worshipful bearing toward him, from her timid admiration of everything about him, which she so helplessly betrayed—of his modish clothes, his finely shaped white hands, his cultivated speech, even his faintly supercilious and autocratic attitude toward herself.

She came toward him, just now, shyly, rubbing her soiled right hand on her hip before offering it to him.

But he waved it off, and resisting, with a strong self-restraint, the tenderness as well as the desire to which she powerfully moved him, he looked down upon her severely as she stood before him.

"Go and sit down again."

She obeyed him like a child, her soft brown eyes fixed upon his face with a doglike anxious uncertainty that acted on his passion for dominance like a titillating stimulant.

She wore a cheap, dressy frock of blue voile trimmed with tawdry white lace, a bunch of artificial flowers on one shoulder, streamers of flimsy blue ribbon at the waist.

He frowned at the slovenly way she sat and she quickly straightened up, pulled her skirt over her knees and tried to look prim.

Spreading his handkerchief on a flat rock a few feet in front of her, he sat down, clasped his shapely hands about his knees and silently, disapprovingly, inspected her. She became uneasy, making a timid, tentative movement to come closer to him, evidently as eager as he was (though less controlled) to begin their "petting party," as she most vulgarly called it. But again he waved her on.

"Not yet," he said curtly. He always held her off in suspense like this for a little while, partly to impress her with a proper sense of her inferiority, partly to prolong the stimulating contemplation of her charms and of her subservience, so that when he did presently permit her to come to him, the nearness of her beauty would be all the more thrilling.

She relaxed against the tree, her pretty head drooping, an adorably childish pout on her red lips. "I'm sure I don't know what I done!" she said in an injured tone, on the verge of tears.

"Did. Say did."

"What I've did," she meekly repeated.

"Oh!" he sighed, "you hopeless child! Didn't they teach you any English grammar at the district school down there?"—with an inclination of his head toward the valley.

"Well, you see, till I was twelf years old a'ready, Pop he wouldn't do it to leave me go to school no more. So I ain't just so good educated that way, like you, Mr. Creighton. You're got an awful nice education—ain't you have? And," she added, drawing a deep breath, "you become your clo'es so! Ach!" She was given to lumping unrelated facts in this way.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

"Star-Spangled Banner" Finished in Rowboat

The last lines of "The Star-Spangled Banner" were written in a rowboat by Francis Scott Key and were not penned in the hold of a prison ship as the old school books taught.

Legendary history was that Key was a prisoner of war while watching the British bombardment of Baltimore and Fort McHenry during the war of 1812. The correct story has been brought to light by the Woman's Home Companion, which shows that Key was permitted to go to the British flagship under a truce signal to obtain the release of a friend who had been taken prisoner, and arrived just as the enemy was ready to open fire.

The young poet developed his verses during the anxiety of the night, but it was while returning to shore in a small boat the following morning that he wrote exultantly "'Tis the Star-Spangled Banner. Oh! long may it wave o'er the land of the free and the home of the brave."

Got Through, All Right

Recently there visited in this city a genuine old Georgia "cracker" from the outlying piney woods section of that state. While here he attended for the first time in his life an Episcopal church service. Later he remarked to a friend:

"It was all as interestin' as a 'possum hunt. I never did know much o' what all the folks about me was a-doin', but I jest kept my wits about me an' fell an' riz with 'em every time."—Boston Globe.

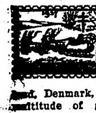
We are sorry to announce that due to sickness to the office staff of the News this week, a lot of good items were forced to lay over until next week. Tuesday evening ye editor consulted a doctor in the matter and was informed that he only had a case of tonsilitis. Bunk! We have all of 60 cases of type here but, we are glad that it was not a case of rum the writer had or the News may have had to lay over until some time next year.

A Humble Postal Clerk's Christmas Eve Dream Come True!



This is the story of the Christmas Seal. Twenty-four years ago Einar Hoelbell, while busily sorting Holiday mail in the postoffice at Charlottenlund, Denmark, was struck with the multitude of gay-colored seals on letters and packages. Suddenly a wonderful idea occurred to him. Why not make these seals mean more than mere decoration by having them represent one cent contributed for tuberculous tots?

The following year in Denmark the first penny seal was sold for health work. In 1907 the plan was introduced into the United States. Einar Hoelbell died during the past year at his home in Denmark at the age of 62 years. A living memorial to him are double-barred cross Christmas Seals.

Important Notice!

A complaint has been made by officers of the Holt Postoffice that young men and girls attending school as well as others not attending school, gather at the Postoffice at distributing time of Mail as well as other times, making disturbance in a most disorderly manner. They have respectfully been warned, but to no avail. They have been known to open boxes belonging to other people than their own.

Any of the foregoing acts is a very serious offence, and if we should impose punishment for such act according to the statute and postal laws, Sec. 318, in which a Justice of the Peace officer is requested to do, and if we fail to do so, the postmaster can close the postoffice until we have done our duty. As Justice of the Peace I take this means to warn you that I will impose the full extent of the law.

A complaint has also been made that the Curfew Ordinance is not enforced, where children under a certain age are required to be home at 9 p. m., from Oct. 1st to April 1st, and not to be allowed to play upon the streets after this hour at night, like they have been doing. As my duty as the Justice of the town, I will see to it that this ordinance is enforced.

K. O. Flakne,
Justice of the Peace.

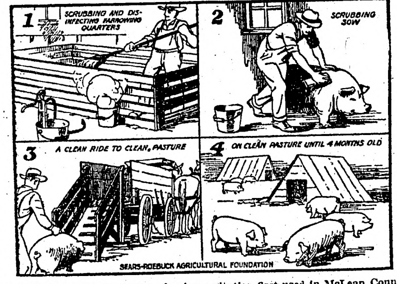
How to Raise More Pigs



1
SCRUBBING AND DISINFECTING FARROWING QUARTERS
2
SCRUBBING SOW
3
A CLEAN RIDE TO CLEAN PASTURE
4
ON CLEAN PASTURE UNTIL 4 MONTHS OLD
SEARS-ROEBUCK AGRICULTURAL FOUNDATION

By following the system of swine sanitation first used in McLean County, Illinois, it is possible to raise 25 to 50 per cent more pigs per litter and get the pigs ready for market several weeks sooner and with less feed than by ordinary methods, the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation indicates. The loss of small pigs and the stunting of growth of those which survive, due to worms and necrotic enteritis can be avoided.

There are four easily performed steps in the system as outlined by the Illinois College of Agriculture:

1. Scrub the farrowing quarters with one pound of lye to 30 gallons of boiling hot water, then spray with one pint of compound cresol solution in four gallons of water. The lye loosens dirt, the hot water kills the worm eggs, and the disinfectant kills the germs of infectious diseases.
2. Wash the sow's sides and udder with soap and water before putting her in the clean farrowing pen. This removes any worm eggs which may be sticking to the body of the sow.
3. Give the sow and pigs a clean ride to a pasture where no hogs have run for at least a year. A pasture which has been in a cultivated crop since last used by hogs is preferable. This avoids contamination from filthy hog lots.
4. Keep the pigs on clean pasture until they are at least four months old.

Farmers who followed this system of preventing contamination from old hog lots reported that 45 minutes were required on the average for one man to scrub the pen for one sow and 20 minutes were required to scrub the sow. The sows raised an average of 6.3 pigs per litter, compared with 4.8 pigs before the system was adopted. There were practically no runts and the pigs reached the usual market weights 6 to 7 weeks earlier than before. Careful records of farmers show that where the McLean system was practiced, 100 pounds of pork were made with 399 pounds of corn and other feeds compared with 501 pounds of corn on farms where no special effort was made to keep the pigs from becoming infested. Four ears of corn plus sanitation were equal to five ears without it.

HEADS NATIONAL SEAL SALE

DR. H. LONGSTREET TAYLOR

For the first time in the history of the Christmas Seal sale, a Minnesota man heads the country-wide campaign. As president of the National Tuberculosis Association, Dr. H. Longstreet Taylor, who at the recent meeting of the organization was honored with the highest office that can be given a tuberculosis worker, officially heads the sale.

"Although the tuberculosis death rate has been cut in half since the first seal sale 20 years ago, 100,000 men, women, and children in the United States are still dying each year from tuberculosis," Dr. Taylor said in a Christmas Seal appeal.

Mail Christmas Gifts Early

When a legal holiday falls on a Sunday, the postal laws provide that all postoffices observe Monday as a holiday. Christmas and New Years come on Sunday, therefore there will be no deliveries on the following Monday. If letters and parcels are not delivered by Dec. 24th they will have to lay over until Dec. 27th.

Christmas parcels and letters should be mailed on or before Dec. 17th, and marked "Do not open until Xmas." It is a physical impossibility for the postoffice folks to handle all holiday mail in only one week. Mail early and avoid the rush.

HOLT WEEKLY NEWS

Issued Weekly From The Home Of The Biggest Co-operative Creamery In Marshall County

One Dollar Fifty Per Year In Advance

H. O. Hanson, Publisher. Holt, Marshall County, Minnesota; Friday, December 23, 1927. Volume 17; Number 34.

A Letter from Ordahl Family

Dear Editors Hanson
and Hagglund:

Inclosed please find $1.50 for the Holt Weekly News. It is interesting to hear from our old camping place where we lived so many years.

I would like to enclose a letter of greetings to our friends and acquaintances in Holt and vicinity.

Again we are nearing the blessed season of Christmas time. Memories of the years we have worked among you draw closer at this time, and our hearts are stirred to express most sincerely the Season's Greetings. May the blessed message of God's Christmas gift, Jesus, our Savior, sink deep into the hearts of men, so the Angel's song may re-echo from our hearts, "Glory be to God in the highest, peace on earth, good will toward men."

We are very glad to know that you now have a pastor, and we join with you in bidding him and his family a hearty welcome. May God's blessing be with him and all of you, for the glory of God and the salvation of souls.

We are all well, and the work in God's kingdom is very promising. In Glenfield 89 souls were added to the congregation on Reformation day. A welcome reception was given after the services in the church parlors by the Ladies Aid.

This congregation [Glenfield] is the smallest in the call, but the work has been blessed and the people encouraged.

A Sunday school of 64 children enrolled is working very satisfactorily. It may be of interest to the girls and boys in the Sunday school in Holt to know that our three Sunday schools here have adopted their Sunday school birthday song. In Sutton and Binford new members will be added to the congregation at Christmas.

With best wishes for a blessed Christmas and a happy and prosperous New Year.

Rev. and Mrs. M. B. Ordahl and children
Binford, N. D.,

Wishing you a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year,

I am,
Sincerely yours,
Henry B. Young,
Postmaster.

Wedding Bells

Miss Lillian Ellefson, daughter of Mrs. T. Ellefson, was united in marriage to William Johnson, son of Mr. and Mrs. W. Johnson of Middle River, on Sunday. The young couple are at the present time making their home with the grooms parents.

The newlyweds have a host of friends here whom join the Holt News in wishing them happiness.

Alamo Originally Church

The Alamo, in Texas, was a Franciscan mission built about 1722 and occasionally used after 1793 as a fort. It consisted of a church, an inclosed convent yard about 100 feet square, a convent, a hospital building and a plaza covering about two and one-half acres and protected by a wall 8 feet high and 33 inches thick.

Praise Became Reproach

The word "Hun" was a term of reproach given to the Germans by their enemies from the beginning of the World war. It seems to have first been associated by William II with his army as a term of praise. He used it in an address to his troops about to sail for China from Bremerhaven, July 27, 1900. For many years the German Socialists used the word "Hun" in attacking the militarists in that country.

Redal Installed

Rev. L. M. Redal, who was called here some time ago to become pastor of the Nazareth Lutheran congregation, was ordained at the Trinity Lutheran church at Thief River Falls on Sunday afternoon. Rev. Aastad of Detroit Lakes conducted the ordination services. On the evening of the same day Rev. Redal was installed here by Rev. Aastad.

Rev. Redal serves three congregations; namely, Holt, Golden Valley, and Silver Creek.

Several people from here motored to Thief River Falls to take in the ordination services on Sunday.

The first successful elevated railway line in the world was opened to traffic in New York 48 years ago. This was the Sixth avenue line, part of which, the extension to Fifty-eighth street, was recently torn down. Later in the same year the Third avenue line was opened. An attempt had been made ten years previously to construct an elevated railway.

Church Sale Came Off Well

The big sale staged by the Ladies Aid and the Dorcas Society Girls of the Nazareth Lutheran church, in the church basement, on Saturday evening Dec. 10th, was a huge success.

The Ladies Aid sold fancy made articles for the sum of $31.35 and they also served a lunch that brought them $10.75. The Dorcas girls sold fancy goods for amount of $21.00 which together with the Ladies Aid money made the total amount of the sale to $63.10.

This sum was considered as a large one to take in from such a small crowd that turned out for this annual event. There were only about 70 people at the sale, and it is hoped that next year there will be a hundred and seventy when the annual sales are put on.

Victor Johnson, formerly of Holt, who has for the past two years been engaged in dredging in South Carolina and New Jersey, arrived at Thief River Falls Saturday to visit with his family. Mrs. Johnson and son came to Thief River from New Jersey early this fall. The last job Mr. Johnson was on, he was only 15 miles from the metropolis, New York.

Olaf Hagen closed a deal recently with the Great Northern Ry. Co., in which he became the owner of one of the company living houses here. He paid $100 for the house and will move it out to his farm where he will remodel it into a nice farm house.

While out hunting recently, Fred Wegge met a large lynx which he shot. These animals are quite scarce in this part of the country, and as far as we know a lynx has not been seen or killed in this vicinity for years.

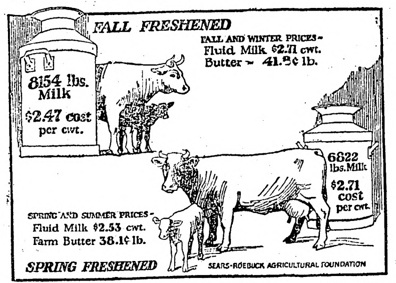
Why Fall Freshening Pays



FALL FRESHENED
FALL AND WINTER PRICES—
Fluid Milk $2.71 cwt.
Butter — 41.8¢ lb.
8154 lbs. Milk
$2.47 cost per cwt.
6822 lbs. Milk
$2.71 cost per cwt.
SPRING AND SUMMER PRICES—
Fluid Milk $2.53 cwt.
Farm Butter 38.1¢ lb.
SPRING FRESHENED
SEARS-ROEBUCK AGRICULTURAL FOUNDATION

Cows freshening during the spring months do not produce milk as economically as those which freshen at other seasons, and prices received for their product average lower, the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation points out.

Records of dairymen covering a five-year period analyzed by the Ohio College of Agriculture showed that cows in herds in which less than 25 per cent freshened in the months of March, April and May produced an average of 8,154 pounds of milk a year at a cost of $2.47 per 100 pounds. Herds in which 35 per cent or more freshened in the spring produced an average of only 6,822 pounds of milk at an average cost of $2.71 per 100 pounds.

The cost of feed and labor per cow was lower in spring freshening herds, but the milk production per cow and the cost of producing 100 pounds of milk decreased as the proportion of spring-freshened cows diminished.

Prices of dairy products tend to be higher during the fall and winter months, when most of the product of fall-freshened cows would be marketed than during the spring and summer months. The price paid to producers at country plants for standard fluid milk containing 3.5 per cent butterfat averaged $2.71 in the six months from October to March, inclusive, in the five years, 1922 to 1926, inclusive, compared with $2.53 in the remaining six months. The price of farm butter averaged 41.8 cents in the six fall and winter months compared with 38.1 cents in the six spring and summer months.

Merry Christmas
Forgetting business, but with lively remembrance of the Good Will it creates, let us renew our wishes for your happiness and prosperity at this season and throughout the New Year.

EASY LESSONS IN AUCTION BRIDGE

By PAUL H. SEYMOUR
Author of "Highlights on Auction Bridge"

(Copyright, by Hoyle, Jr.)

Article Fourteen.

Secondary Bids

THE informatory double sometimes is used on the second round of bidding in a way which may need some explanation. If second hand doubles dealer's original bid either of a suit or no trump and third hand makes a bid, fourth hand will pass unless having a real assisting hand. If dealer now also passes and second hand still is desirous of forcing his partner to bid he will double again. This still would be an informatory double unless third hand's bid were two no trump.

The rules for assisting bids by third hand are somewhat altered after the first round of bidding:

To raise an original bid four assisting tricks are necessary; but after dealer raises his own bid third hand may assist when holding one less trick, (namely, three), and if dealer raises his own bid twice without hearing from his partner, the requirements for an assisting bid are lowered to two. In other words the greater the strength shown by dealer in raising his own bid, the less strength is required by third hand to make an assisting bid.

When third hand has overbid dealer's one no trump with a minor suit bid of two, the danger signal has been waved and dealer should not rebid the no trump unless he expects to win all of his tricks from his own hand.

If third hand has overbid by three of a minor suit it shows unusual strength and length and no re-entry card in other suits. In such case, if dealer has any one of the other three suits unprotected it would be far better for him to pass and allow the minor suit to win the declaration; but with no danger of opponents running another suit dealer should bid three no trump as this minor suit should be of great assistance to him, and a no trump should net a much better score than a minor.

If third hand overbids by two of a major suit it is again a showing of strength, and dealer should pass unless he has less than normal expectancy in that major; in which case he should bid two no trump.

Fourth Hand Bidding

After dealer has bid one no trump and second and third hands have passed, fourth hand often may find it advisable to bid two of a suit for the purpose of announcing his strong suit to his partner. This is called a lead-directing bid and is made with the expectation that dealer will overbid it by saying two no trump.

If the no trump declaration wins, second hand will lead this suit and by so doing often will enable the adversaries to win a trick or two which they could not otherwise have obtained. If dealer passes or changes his no trump bid to a suit, second hand must not credit his partner with original bidding strength, as such a lead-directing bid may be made on one or two tricks less.

After two rounds of bidding, rebidding in general is a good deal like bidding for the purchase of something at an auction sale. After one has bid what he thinks his hand is worth he is inclined to bid just one more because some one has overbid him. When one has a good strong hand for a certain bid he does not want to give up and let his opponent play the hand at something else against which most of his good cards will be worthless. In such situations many a hand is overbid tremendously, and frequently one side loses heavily. Here psychology enters the game and the one who wins most frequently is the one who can best estimate his opponents' mental processes and determine how high he can induce them to bid or how trustworthy their bids are. This is called psychology by some, pure bluff by others, and who shall say that it is right or wrong? We call a certain player shrewd—which does not mean that he understands the scientific principles of the game better than others, but that he reads his partner and his opponents and learns more from their bids than others could. Every Auction player should therefore try to gain as much information as possible from the manner of bidding of other players, and also to convey as little information as possible to his opponents by his manner.

Trial Not Necessary After the Election

President Roosevelt never turned a deaf ear to his Spanish war rough riders when they appealed to him for help. On one occasion a rough rider was indicted for killing a man in a western state and he wrote to the President, asking for a loan of $200 to hire a lawyer to defend him. The crime had taken place in some sort of ranch brawl. In keeping with his custom, the President sent the requested $200, never expecting to see it again, James Amos, former family servant of the Roosevelts, relates in an article in Collier's Weekly. However, a short time later, much to his surprise, he got another letter from the same man, returning the $200. The letter said in substance:

"Dear Teddy: I'm sending back the money I borrowed to help at my trial. We didn't need to have no trial, as we elected our district attorney."

Wrong Phone Numbers Not Jokes for Caller

Milwaukee.—For five minutes a man stood at a telephone in a restaurant of onlookers; he got the wrong number.

Some watched his efforts smilingly, while others made remarks intended for humor.

Finally, in a rage, the man hung up the receiver, whirled around and whipped out a pistol.

"I'll give you jokers something to laugh at," he shouted. "If any of you move except to put up your hands, I'll drill you. Back up against the wall."

A dozen lined the wall.

"Down on your knees," he commanded and the dozen complied.

"Now, how do you like it? Laugh that off."

Keeping them covered with his pistol, he backed out of the place. The gun-play was reported to the police.

WOMAN SLAYER BACK IN PRISON

Fugitive Returns After Years of Liberty.

Dover, N. H.—The mixing bowls and pots and pans in a little cottage in Troy, N. Y., lie unused while, in a hospital for the insane here, a friendly little woman is receiving peace from her conscience because she has returned to the custody of the law which she fled nine years ago.

The little woman is Mrs. Mary Folsom, convicted murderer of her husband. In Troy, though, she was Mary Rust, middle-aged business woman.

Mary Rust never talked of her past during the nine years in which she built up a comfortable little business in Troy. She made cakes, pies and other dainties for the neighborhood in which she lived and made many friends.

Then the other morning her customers found her cottage-bakery deserted. Later came word that Mrs. Mary Folsom had surrendered to the authorities in Dover because her conscience troubled her.

Then Troy learned that its Mary Rust was a criminal.

In Dover Mrs. Folsom told how she had fled directly from the hospital to Troy, where she worked as a domestic and then opened her bakery.

Dog Saves Life of Man Hit by Falling Tree

Sydney.—When John Flynn, twenty, was knocked unconscious and pinned to the ground by a fallen tree in the Victorian bush, his dog saved his life. The animal waited near the man's motionless body, and licked his face until Flynn revived slightly.

Flynn had just enough strength to scribble a call for help to his mother and tie it in a handkerchief round the dog's neck. The animal headed homewards. After it had run two miles to the Flynn home, Mrs. Flynn did not notice the handkerchief round the dog's neck, and for several hours the dog fretted around the house until another member of the household returned and saw the mute message.

A relief party was quickly organized, and led by the dog, it proceeded toward the scene of the accident. Three-quarters of a mile from there the party met Flynn, crawling painfully along the track. Believing that the dog's mission had failed, Flynn had started laboriously to dig himself out of his prison, using only his hands.

Taken as Wife Deserter After 20-Year Lapse

Camden, N. J.—Arthur Kraemer Shinn, fifty-five years old, was brought here from Lakewood by Camden county detectives to face the wife he is alleged to have deserted more than a score of years ago to elope with the nurse who was attending Mrs. Shinn prior to the birth of their first child.

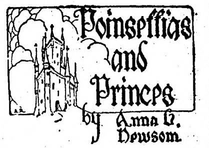
Shinn was held without bail at the Camden (county) jail by order of Prosecutor Ethan P. Westcott. Mrs. Mary Albertine Shinn, now sixty-eight years old, of this city, appealed to Mr. Wescott to find her husband some time ago when advancing age made it difficult to support herself. She said she and Shinn were married in 1905. Police say Shinn was found living with the former Miss Mason, whom he married.

$1,500 Goods Lie Safe in Busy Street Five Days

New York. — While detectives searched far and near for a package containing $1,500 worth of jewelry and hosiery, and while anxious consignor and consignee passed five sleepless nights wondering about it, the valuable parcel rested unnoticed on Market street, Newark, N. J., a few paces from the world's second busiest street corner.

The package was sent from a New York firm to the Milmar Shops, Inc., No. 161 Market street. Julius Milmar signed for the parcel, but the express company driver left it on the sidewalk.

It remained there until a policeman ordered Milmar to remove the "rubbish," as it was obstructing traffic. It was the jewelry and hosiery.



Poinsettias and Princes

by Anna G. Dewsom

IT WAS December 23; there would be a rush for Christmas flowers at the Alpha Floral rooms that day; and the girls were already busy getting the windows redecorated.

"How did Miss Anne say to put these poinsettias in the east window?" asked Ardus Ellington, who was helping out during the holidays.

"The old girl said to graduate them," answered Jane Duncan, who was "regular help" at the shop. "Of course, with you, a college stude, graduate means to turn out—to finish up. That's what I'd like to do with these flowers—finish them. I'm so tired of them."

"I'm afraid you don't love flowers," voiced Ardus. "I do."

"You would," retorted Jane, who liked for everyone to think her sophisticated if not depraved. "I like the little old coin I get at the end of the week; and it's little enough, believe me. But come here, innocent, and I'll show you how to graduate the posies. Park the shortest ones next the glass, the taller ones next, and so on—like this."

Ardus saturated the black sand in the flower pots, and carried other pots from another room while the others drained a bit.

Miss Anne called from a workroom at the rear, and Jane answered the call, while Ardus worked at the window. Just as Jane returned with an armload of made-up flowers to box, Henry Von Hagen came into the shop.

"I better take him; he's a regular," said Jane in an undertone; and she deposited the orders on a table.

"May I help you, please?" she asked, demurely enough.

"Some poinsettias, I think," answered the man, and Jane led the way to where Ardus was working.

Henry looked at the plant Ardus was lifting for the window. He also looked at the girl.

"This is a beauty," he said, looking at the girl, though he indicated the plant. "I'll take this one, and these two," he continued, selecting other plants. "Then I'd like to have some of the cut blossoms."

Jane went before him into an adjoining room, where he selected two dozen of the cut flowers with stems of varied length. Back in the office he gave the address; wrote a check in payment; and left the shop looking at Ardus Ellington.

"That nut's sayin' it with poinsettias, I'd say," remarked Jane, going back to packing the flowers.

"I'd say a prince instead of a nut—if I were getting the flowers," smiled Ardus.

"Well, I'll say the way he lamped you would indicate that he'd say 'princess' to you, innocent. Why'n't y'u flirt a bit?"

Ardus Carried Other Pots From Another Room.

"Who is he," asked Ardus, ignoring her question.

"Head engineer at the Public Service or something. Name's Von Hagen. His old man's a professor here for years—romantic languages. Y'u ought to know him. Maybe you've had classes under the old gink."

"I think I do know who he is; but I have no classes with him till next year. But who were the flowers for?"

"Gettin' inquisitive already?" asked the girl, teasingly. "Well, he's sending them as a Christmas present to his mamma," she said, accenting the last syllable.

The conversation was stopped by a customer, and for the rest of the day a busy stream of happy shoppers ran in and out of the shop.

Miss Anne was wrapping some poinsettias for the girls; Ardus selecting some violets for her coat collar; and the Christmas greetings were being exchanged at the same time. Jane exclaimed:

"Well, I gotta beat it. My sweetie's takin' me to the Orpheum tonight. Suppose you're goin' to one of the big 'Y.-W.' parties that some of the professors' wives are throwing for the orphan studes?"

"Yes, and I'm mighty thankful for a chance to go to a party. It's pretty nice, when one must be away from home at Christmas. The funny part is that there are three parties, and none of us knows to which party he's going—or at whose home the party will be. We are to be called for and are to ask no questions. Isn't that thrilling?"

"'Twould almost startle a turtle, don't ya know. Well, good night; don't do anything I wouldn't." And Jane was gone.

After supper, Ardus dressed with much care, and then came down to sit in the cheer of the grate fire.

She wondered what the folks at home were doing, and tried to visualize every member of the family. She stood looking into a huge poinsettia on the table. She remembered a dream she had the night before, and that she had not remembered till that minute; but just then an auto horn sounded outside.

She hurried into her coat and hat, pulling on her gloves as she went down the steps. Some one she didn't know was coming up the walk. He turned, after greetings, and they went together to the waiting car.

Ardus had no more than buttoned her coat high around her neck, being careful of the violets, than the driver said:

When Ardus Came Down the Steps She Was Met by Henry.

"Here we are," as he drew up in front of a large home and stopped.

He assisted Ardus to alight, walked to the steps with her, lifted his hat and said "good night."

"Good night—and thank you," answered the girl.

Ardus went up the broad steps and rang the bell. Henry Von Hagen opened the door.

"Good evening," he said cordially, taking her hand. "Mother, this is Miss Ellington."

"I'm so glad you could come. Go upstairs to the first room you come to."

When Ardus came down the steps she was met by Henry, who led her into a big living room. Poinsettias were grouped in the big old-fashioned bay window. Gazing into one of the flowers, Henry said:

"You know, I had the queerest dream last night."

"So did I," joined Ardus.

"I dreamed," continued Henry, "that I went to the opera, and when the curtains were drawn—"

"There was a huge poinsettia on either side of the stage," interrupted Ardus.

"And when the orchestra played 'Dreams of Love' a—"

"A prince stepped out of one of the flowers—a prince with page boys, attendants, and so on," interrupted the girl again.

"How in the world could you know what I dreamed?" asked Henry. "But you do; and a princess stepped out of the other bloom—a princess with as many attendants and ladies-in-waiting. They began a—"

"A march to music toward the center front of the stage," said Ardus.

Henry's countenance revealed surprise, excitement, incredulity; but he continued:

"How could you know what I dreamed—I didn't even remember it myself till I looked at that flower. But they did march toward the center front of the stage. And when they met, the prince kissed the princess, and she put her arms around his neck—"

"And you were the prince," said Ardus.

"And you were the princess," finished Henry.

Their lips met; her arms were about his neck; his arm encircled her waist. Some one in another room laughed aloud. Then Henry and Ardus saw that they were under the mistletoe.

Unabashed, Henry said:

"I've been looking for you always, dear; when will you marry me?"

Ardus replied:

"Yes, I knew yesterday that you were the one—and then that dream—that proves we belong to each other—"

"Of course, I've dreamed of you always—but when will we be married?"

"Just any time you say, dear."

Tales From the Oil-Fields.

by William Allen Ward

ROUGH NECK

MAN with the big hands;
Builder of oil-fields;
Glad to be called Rough Neck—
Of you I sing!

Man who eats sow-belly and
Brown beans and washes them
Down with thick black coffee—
Of you I sing!

Man who looks in the dictionary
To find the meaning of dyspepsia—
Of you I sing.

HIJACKER

HE poked a gat in my ribs
And took my money······
The money I had earned
Digging a pipe line
From Burkburnett to Fort Worth.
He wore no mask.
He was not excited.
The hijacker is a robber,
But I like him better···
Better than the cafe owner
In the oil town
Who held me up with his Cash register.

TRUCK-DRIVER

OVER roads that yesterday
Were cattle trails,
The lumbering trucks crawl
Toward the Texas oil field.
The fussy motors sputter,
For the roads are muddy,
And the load of pipes
Is heavy and easy to jolt.
But a gray-haired truck-driver
Unlike younger drivers,
Is laughing······
Twenty years ago he rode
A bucking broncho along this trail
And the jolting oil field truck
Reminds him of those happy days!

CINCO CENTAVOS

CINCO Centavos was a Mex
Who carried water to
Drillers and tool dressers.
Nobody knew his name,
But a rough-neck said:
'He's worth about five cents';
So the Mexican was called
Cinco Centavos······
One day a shooter
Dropped nitro in a well,
But the stuff did not work
The way it should and started
Back, as it sometimes does.
Everybody ran, except Cinco:
He stood beside the well
And caught the nitro cylinder
In his hand as it shot
Up from the well!

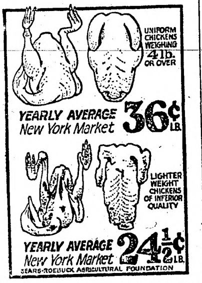
Quality Pays in Poultry Market

ADDING practically 50 per cent to the market value of a product by extra attention paid to improving its quality has the ring of a "get-rich-quick" proposition. Yet, that is the premium which the finest quality roasters commanded over the lowest grade during the past twelve months, according to the Sears Roebuck Agricultural Foundation.

The best fresh killed roasters, or young birds weighing four pounds or over, received in the New York wholesale market in the year ending September 30 brought an average of 36 cents a pound. During the same period, roasters were received which were so lacking in market quality that they could be sold for an average of only 24½ cents a pound.

To command top prices, birds must be plump and thick-fleshed with rather short, thick legs and wings. They must be young, hence their flesh must not be coarse or darkened, and they must show light development of spurs. They must be milk-fed. American consumers prefer birds from yellow-skinned breeds.



UNIFORM CHICKENS WEIGHING 4 lb. OR OVER
YEARLY AVERAGE New York Market 36¢ LB.
LIGHTER WEIGHT CHICKENS OF INFERIOR QUALITY
YEARLY AVERAGE New York Market 24½¢ LB.
SEARS-ROEBUCK AGRICULTURAL FOUNDATION

Part of the premium is due to careful dressing and packing. First-grade birds are free from such imperfections as torn skin, bruises, blood spots, and pin feathers and are packed in boxes of a dozen birds of uniform size and color. Feed in the crops or dirty feet, heads or bodies, will lower the grade.

Farmers located near the cities and large towns can obtain some of the premium which consumers are willing to pay for superior birds through selling on roadside markets, booths in city markets, customer routes on which weekly deliveries are made, or contracts with grocers and butchers catering to high-class trade, or with restaurants, hotels and clubs. Farmers who must depend on distant markets usually find it best to pen-fatten their birds, using dry grain instead of the soft milk mashes employed in crate fattening. Express shipments of live birds fed in this way will command a premium from those wholesalers in the large markets who have a high-class trade and who are always looking for poultry which will fill their requirements.

Dawn McNeill, the Duluth queen of beauty, said in an interview at Atlantic City:

"Prices have gone up horribly since I was a little girl. In this hotel here the price of a front room with a bath is almost 'inabordable as the French say; and when it comes to French frocks—well, we girls are paying five times as much for a French frock as we used to, and yet—"

Miss McNeill glanced coquettishly down at her crossed silken knees.

—"and yet," she ended, "we are not getting a fifth as much for our money."

> STORY FROM THE START
>
> Handsome, fastidious and wealthy—young St. Croix Creighton awaits his sweetheart at their trysting place. She is fifteen minutes late, this ordinary little Pennsylvania Dutch girl, Meely Schwenckton, but he awaits her eagerly. She is so demurely beautiful, he thinks, but so out of his "class."

"But look here," he said, puzzled, "I'm sure the Pennsylvania law has, for the past ten years or more, required children to attend school up to the age of fourteen years, and recently longer. Don't tell me you are over twenty-four years old—only a year younger than I am!"

"But you see," Meely offered in explanation, "Pop he was a school director and could do what he liked. He's awful determined. That's why our Jake he won't live at home no more, Pop he's so determined. Leave him think a thing's right and he wouldn't listen to even Roosevelt or—or even you yet!"

"Do you know," he said after an instant's silence, "I am seriously displeased with you today?"

"What for, Mr. Creighton?" she asked plaintively. "What did I—done—did?"

"You were fifteen minutes late! When I say I'll meet you at half-past four I don't mean a quarter to five."

"But—but I was here before you, Mr. Creighton," she answered in surprise. "I didn't keep you waiting—I waited."

"That's not the point. The point is you weren't here at half-past four. Don't—let—it—happen—again!"

"But—how do you know I wasn't here—seein' you wasn't here your own self?"

"Never mind how I know. I know a lot more about you than you think I do, my little girl!"

"Oh!" She looked at him queerly—almost as though she were trying not to laugh.

"Now, then, why were you fifteen minutes late?"

"I had to mind my step-mom's baby whiles the others helped Pop with his cider-makin'.

"And then," she continued, "till I was through all I had to wait till Pop was out of the way; I darsen't leave him see me come away! Well, I guess anyhow not!"

"He is 'determined' with you, too, is he?"

"Well, I guess anyhow then!"

"You use five words, Meely, where two or three would suffice. Instead of 'Well-I-guess-anyhow-then,' just answer yes."

"I know I talk awful dumb!" Meely humbly admitted, looking abashed. "I don't see why you bother to make dates with a common thing like me!—that I don't."

"'Make dates?'" he repeated dubiously.

"Yes, and listen oncet, Mr. Creighton"—Meely lowered her voice, though the nearest human being was two miles away—"that there crabbed old-maid sister of my step-mom's that's come to help out over my step-mom's confinement, she's suspicioning me!"

"Of meeting me?" he asked a bit uneasily. He had such a very strong reason for being afraid of an awkward entanglement, or of its being known that he philandered with a farmer's common daughter.

"Ach, she don't go so far as to suspicion my Date is a swell like you, Mr. Creighton. She says to me, she says, 'I know who your Date is, he's that there blond young man at Zentmyer's farm!' she says. And me, I just left her think it was him."

"But," St. Croix demanded, instantly jealous, and himself as suspicious as the "old-maid sister," "what reason does she have for thinking your 'Date' is 'the blond young man'? You must have given her reason."

"Ach, well!" Meely cast down her eyes and looked self-conscious. "To be sure, Mr. Creighton, there's others that admars me besides yourself—that's only to be expected, ain't it?"

"And do you have 'dates' with this blond young man?"

"Well, to be sure, since I knowed you, Mr. Creighton, other ones does seem awful common to me, that they do!"

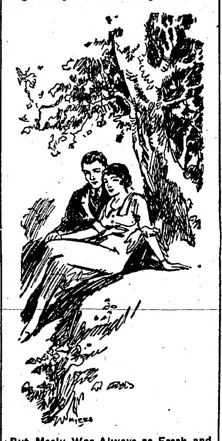
St. Croix had a passing twinge of conscience for his own responsibility in possibly spoiling this girl's chances for a contented married life with a husband of her own class. But he reassured himself with the reflection that from the first she had sought him out quite as much as he had pursued her. Seducing an innocent virgin was certainly not one of the things he was capable of doing!

"What I have afraid of," said Meely, "is that my step-mom's old-maid sister will take a sneak on me some day and follow me up here unknownst—she's just that mean-dispositioned! And you see, Pop he'd say you wasn't keepin' comp'ny with me fur really; not to marry me; a swell like you yet! Well, I guess anyhow not!"

"Is your stepmother's sister a permanent fixture at the farm?" St. Croix uneasily inquired.

"No, thanks be! Till my step-mom's well again, her sister goes—and good riddance!"

St. Croix had often noticed with a slight surprise that in spite of her awful English, Meely was never at a loss when he used words of several syllables not in her own vocabulary.



But Meely Was Always as Fresh and Fragrant as the Morning Dew.

"Do you like your stepmother any better than you like her old-maid sister?"

"Well, she ain't so crabbed and bossy like her sister, but she's awfully sulky to my little sister and brother—and me. If it wasn't that I hate to leave Sammy and Lizzie," said Meely mournfully, "I'd do like our Jakey done—I'd take and run off, too!"

"But," said St. Croix hastily, "you wouldn't go so far that I—that you couldn't see me, would you? Come here!"

She sprang up, her face alight, as the permission was given, and went to him. He held her close as they sat together on the broad flat stone, his arm about her waist, her head on his breast. Girls of her "class" had always been to him, hitherto, untouchable, so fastidious was his distaste for any contact with the unbathed. But Meely was always as fresh and fragrant as the morning dew!

His fingers caressed her hair, her white slender neck, her delicate sweet face. But though he could never quite understand just how she did it, she had always somehow managed to hold him off from kissing her lips. He kissed her hands, her throat, her bare arms—her lips ever eluded him; in spite of the fact that she seemed as much enamored of him as he of her.

"Do you know, Meely, ever since I first met you, that night at the barn dance, I've had the queerest feeling of something familiar in your face—I'm sure I never saw you before that night"—he knew he could not have seen her and forgotten it—"yet I can't get away from the feeling of something familiar about you."

Meely shook her head over it. "I ain't familiar with you," she said.

"I believe," said St. Croix, frowning thoughtfully, "that there's surely some psychic reason for my feeling!"

"How do you spell that?" asked Meely.

"Another thing"—he ignored her question—"your Pennsylvania Dutch accent is a bit different—"

"I know I don't talk so dumb like some talks—for all I do talk pretty dumb. But some 'round here gives awful funny sounds when they talk! Did you ever take notice to it a'ready?"

"Did I? Gosh!"

"Say, Mr. Creighton, you've been sayin' what you think is queer at me, darst I tell you what wonders me at you?"

"Shoot it!"

"You are the first swell I ever knowed—have knew—though I have saw 'em a'ready—but not to keep comp'ny with 'em, you understand. Well, you're awful diff'runt to what I'd conceited a swell gentleman was like!"

St. Croix looked amused. "No doubt!"

"You see, when Pop first brang home his young wife I was that mad I run in town and hired myself fur a week to a family where the son was the high-toned-est party I ever have saw!—and he was awful diff'runt to what you are. He was so polite to the ladies that way—he belittled hisself pickin' up fur 'em and fetchin' and carryin' fur 'em—and hoppin' up to give 'em his seat—my goodness! It looked awful nice! Ach!" said Meely, with a long sigh of pleasant reminiscence, "wouldn't it be grand to have your Mister act that polite to you even when there wasn't no comp'ny! This here gentleman to which I make reference to, he acted just that polite when no one was 'round to see him do it! Yes, mind you! Why, he acted just that polite to me yet and me only one of the help!"

"Oh, he did, did he?" St. Croix murmured jealously. "He was only stringing you, Meely—"

"Ach, no! Fur to all the other help, too, old and young, he was just that polite. And so, till I met up with you a'ready, Mr. Creighton, I conceited all high gentlemen was like that there."

St. Croix was surprised to find himself piqued uncomfortably by this ignorant girl's intimation (unconscious though it was) that he did not measure up to her funny standard of a "gentleman"—just imagine! Yes, grotesque it might be, but it pricked him.

A sudden suspicion flashed on him—was she unconscious of what she was implying, or was she actually giving him a sly dig? Her amiable patience under his bullying had sometimes seemed "a bit thick"!

"Say, Mr. Creighton," she continued, "I'd like awful well to see you in the comp'ny of swell ladies oncet! I bet you'd be just as polite as that there party to which I made reference to. For to be sure, you couldn't boss swell ladies 'round like you do me, could you, now? And you'd have to fetch and carry fur 'em and hop up and give 'em your chair just that nice!—ach! Wouldn't I like to see you at it! I bet you'd look nice!" She fetched a long breath. "I wisht I was nice educated that men would treat me like that!"

St. Croix was smitten with compunction. "You poor kid!" he said, patting her cheek, "you'd like to be treated 'like a swell lady,' would you?"

"No, it's the other way 'round—I'd like a man to treat me like as if he was a fine gentleman."

She said it so innocently he could not suspect her of guile.

"And you think," he smiled, "that I don't treat you as if I were 'a fine gentleman'?"

"Well, you can judge of that better'n me, you know the ways of gentlemen better'n me. Anyhow," she conceded, as though offering him consolation, "you look awful swell anyhow, with all the different tony suits you're got with hose and neckties to match—ach!"

"Meely!" he exclaimed, trying to kiss her on the mouth, but achieving only a peck at her chin, "sometimes I think you're just a sly little cat!"

As her head was on his shoulder and his cheek against her hair, he did not see the sudden flash of her eyes which momentarily transformed her face from its usual vacancy to a sparkling vivacity. When, however, as she did not reply, he turned up her chin to look at her, the dullness which now veiled her countenance like a mask effectually dispelled his momentary doubts.

Bulk Grain Handling Benefit to Farmers

By handling grain in bulk instead of sacks, wheat growers of the Pacific coast, it is authoritatively stated, are saving approximately 10 cents a bushel in operating costs.

Sacked wheat has disappeared almost entirely from export channels at Portland, and bulk handling is rapidly gaining favor in Seattle.

Abandonment of the sack method was advocated by federal market experts when freight rates West were materially reduced by the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific railways, which carry export wheat from the interior to Vancouver.

Able to place their grain in Pacific ports at a much lower cost, Canadian farmers were in position to take the foreign market almost entirely away from American growers unless economic strategy made it possible for them to offer their wheat at a corresponding price.

By discarding the sack method for bulk shipping, says E. N. Bates, investigator for the federal bureau of agricultural economics, harvesting and handling as well as marketing costs are reduced.

"The farmer," he explains, "is relieved of the yearly sacks and twine bill. High-priced labor for sewing and handling the sacks is eliminated. Grain in bulk can be cleaned and conditioned in the country, saving freight on dockage and enabling the farmer to put on the market a higher grade

For the answer we turned to medical men and asked them this question:

Do you think from your experience with LUCKY STRIKE cigarettes that they are less irritating to sensitive or tender throats than other cigarettes, whatever the reason?

11,105✱doctors answered this question "YES."

Mary Boland, Delightful Actress, writes:

"For a number of years, I noticed that Lucky Strikes were the overwhelming popular cigarette with most actors. It was only natural, when I started to smoke, that I try Lucky Strikes. Now I know it is rightfully called 'the actors' favorite.' It is the most enjoyable cigarette and results in no throat irritation or harshness and this means everything to us of the stage."

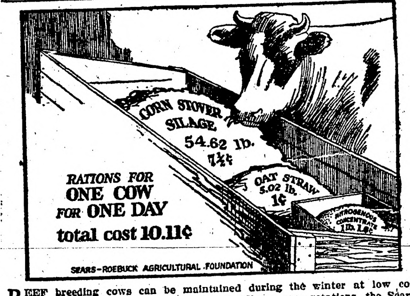
How Beef Can Be Fed for a Dime a Day



CORN STOVER SILAGE 54.62 lb. 7½¢
OAT STRAW 5.02 lb. 1¢
NITROGENOUS CONCENTRATE 1 lb. 1.6¢
RATIONS FOR ONE COW FOR ONE DAY total cost 10.11¢
SEARS-ROEBUCK AGRICULTURAL FOUNDATION

Beef breeding cows can be maintained during the winter at low cost almost entirely on the by-products of ordinary crop rotations, the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation points out. By this means, the purchase of feeder cattle at prices which are comparatively high, due to the current shortage of cattle, can be avoided.

Such cows have been carried for a period of 154 days by the Illinois Agricultural Experiment Station on a ration consisting of 54.61 pounds of silage made from corn stover, 5.02 pounds of oat straw and one pound of nitrogenous concentrate. The cost averaged 10.11 cents a day, counting stover silage at $2.75 a ton, oat straw at $4 a ton and nitrogenous concentrate such as cottonseed meal at 1.6 cents a pound. The cost of the stover silage was based entirely on the man and horse labor and machine cost of putting the stover into the silo. When nitrogenous concentrate is higher or lower in price, the cost of the ration would be varied accordingly.

The high cost of feeder cattle probably will constitute a serious problem in the next few years, the Foundation states, owing to the decline in the number of beef cattle in the range states which furnish most of the feeder cattle supply, and the decline in market receipts which has resulted. A decided advance in prices of stocker and feeder cattle has occurred already. At Chicago, the average cost to buyers in the fall of 1927 has been about $8.85 per hundred pounds compared with $6.05 a year previous and an average cost of $6.50 during the fall seasons of the last five years. By wintering on the stover silage, straw and nitrogenous concentrate ration and by carrying through the summer on legume pasture, particularly sweet clover, farmers can raise their own feeders at moderate cost. The calves produced should be pushed along as rapidly as possible and marketed as baby beef at twelve to eighteen months of age.

I AM the Great Northern Railway... Eleven thousand miles of tracks, sixty thousand cars and twelve hundred locomotives are my body and sinew... Thirty thousand loyal workers are my heart and soul... You and I and the Northwest have all grown up together... When I came buffaloes roamed the plains; the mountain fastnesses held secure their secrets... I blazed my trail and laid my bands of steel.

All has changed since then... Christmas carols float through the air to thousands of happy Yuletide firesides where, when I came, no man abided.

Prosperity and disappointment we have shared alike—and together—during these many years... You have conquered the soil, the forests, the streams, and the mountains... Together we face the future with confidence, happy in the thought that the future of the Northwest is before and not behind us.

As You and Your Dear Ones gather around your Christmas trees, I wish you well... We are with you in spirit although many of my numerous family are scattered from their firesides because now—this minute—I am hurling snow from my rails; my trains are rushing to you with those you love, bringing to you from the outside world gifts and things that add to your Yuletide pleasures, and carrying the products of your toil and skill to distant marts.

Ceaselessly, tirelessly, vigilantly, I carry on... Your interests are my interests; your hopes, my hopes; your successes, my successes.

May all of you—and the 30,000 men and women who are a part of me—enjoy a happy Christmas, and the realization of your fondest hopes during the coming year!

The Rock of Minkedola

by Anton Romatka

ON the rock of Minkedola
Underneath a tropic sky,
Kneels a sobbing Negro maiden,
And her wild emotions fly
And convulse each dusky feature,
While the mocking echoes say:
"Gone forever is your lover,
Go you back to Congo bay."

There is naught on Minkedola
But the wailing for one dead.
Overwhelming bitter sorrow
In her soul with hatred wed.
And the echoes, rudely shouting,
Sing the self-same weary lay:
"Gone forever is your lover,
Go you back to Congo bay."

And the rock of Minkedola,
Pointing upward to the sky,
Sees a dusky maiden leaping
Far below with frenzied cry.
And hyenas roar their laughter,
While the waterfalls still say:
"Gone forever is your lover,
Go you back to Congo bay."

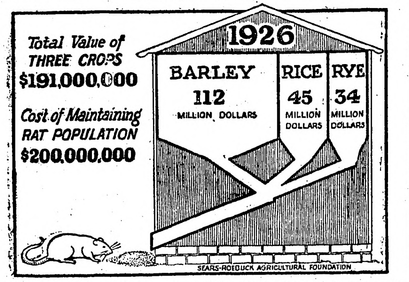
Tremendous Cost of Our Rat Population



THE cost of maintaining the rat population of the United States aggregates $200,000,000 a year, which is equal to almost two dollars for every man, woman and child in the country. An excellent example of the enormity of this wanton destruction is found in comparing it with the total valuation of some of our principal crops. The barley, rice and rye crop last year was worth $191,000,000. If the rat population restricted its diet to these three crops, it would consume the entire production and still fall $9,000,000 short of satisfying its appetite, according to the Sears Roebuck Agricultural Foundation. In addition to this enormous destruction of food, the rat is a carrier of such serious diseases as bubonic plague, rabies, infections, jaundice and sleeping sickness.

Farmers probably bear more than their proportionate share of this expense by harboring them in barns and cribs. The increase in the course of one year from one pair of rats allowed to survive under favorable conditions may easily reach 100, since they will produce from six to ten litters a year, averaging ten young per litter, and the young will breed when four months of age.

Farms can be freed of these pests if proper steps are taken. These include burning the trash which harbors them, raking refuse from under such buildings as corn cribs, piling lumber and other material a foot or more above ground and using effective poisons. Cribs and rat burrows under concrete can be fumigated with calcium cyanide, which can be easily used by any mature person. Red Squill is a newly developed poison which rats will take readily when mixed with foods. It is relatively harmless to other animals as it is distasteful to them and it acts as an emetic when taken by them in harmful quantities.

Many Attended Church Program

The Christmas entertainment given in the Nazareth Lutheran church by the Sunday school children on Monday evening was exceptionally well arranged. The one thing lacking was the capacity of the church which was filled to overflowing. The program commenced at 8 p. m., and for an hour and a half it was one round of pleasure consisting of recitations, dialogs and songs.

Much time has been spent by the Sunday School teachers in training the children and much work had to be done to arrange the progrom and fix up the tree, but they were rewarded for their time and labor as the children knew their parts well and the program was a great success.

LITTLE IS KNOWN OF WORLD'S RICHEST MAN

Sir Basil Zaharoff Called Man of Mystery.

Paris.—Sir Basil Zaharoff, often called the richest man in the world, has probably never told anything about himself or what he is doing. So he has been known as the mystery man of international finance, and the sleeping partner of the world! His power of riches has been exercised more widely than that of any other rich man of the world! So all must be interested in the announcement from London that:

"The Daily Mail understands that Sir Basil Zaharoff has decided to retire from active business. He intends to spend most of his time at his Monte Carlo villa."

Public attention is thus drawn again to his simply vast property holdings and unimaginably varied money activities. Only a few days ago, the great English house of Vickers (arms and munitions) presented him with a cup in commemoration of his 50 years with the firm. That connection alone spread Zaharoff's activities quite round the globe. And when the peace conference came in 1919 to settle up such world affairs as arms and munitions, it found Zaharoff an active leader in many other things quite as important.

The sober London organ says:

"Many stories of his vast influence in international politics were no doubt born of the mystery which his fierce dislike of any kind of publicity created; but enough truth remains to establish him as one of the great international figures of the present generation."

Became Fnancial Power.

And with all its mystery we now know something of this man of exotic race, whose youth in strange lands was followed by his steady rise to secret but immense financial influence, first in England, then in Europe, and last of all in the entire world—with his daily life more and more hidden away in Paris and Monte Carlo.

In 1924 the world was really thrilled by the marriage which closed a long romance late in life and was followed by the death of his wife a year ago.

For a marriage, French law requires the exact names of the parties to be posted in the mayor's office. Now, the marriage of Zaharoff with the widow of the king of Spain's cousin was celebrated in the little village where he owns a country residence—the modest chateau of Ratincourt, once occupied by Leopold, king of the Belgians.

One of the few French newspaper men who arrived in time, saw that Sir Basil was registered with an unknown first name—that of "Zachary." Privately he has always held to this name. Even in the present Paris Telephone Annual he appears as "Z. Basil Zaharoff."

It is his Russian name. For although he was born in Constantinople, his father is said to be, like Levine of the airplanes, from the Ukraine. His mother contributed the "Basil," being Greek, or as the legend has it, Circassian. But by legal nationality, he is neither Turk, Russian, Greek nor English in spite of the knighthood which makes him Sir Basil.

Man Without a Country.

He is not even French, as the French actually supposed from his long residence among them, in Paris and Monte Carlo.

Zaharoff, in fact, is one of those peculiar men deprived by the war of their birth citizenship—a man without a country legally! In England, he is a capitalist knighted by the king. In France, he is a capitalist—and domiciled. But in reality he is what he has always been—a citizen of the world.

At twenty-seven he was already the efficient agent in St. Petersburg of the Nordenfeldt steel firm, arms and munitions. In a few years this was to be absorbed by the firm founded in England to exploit the inventions of Sir Hiram Maxim. And then Maxim's was amalgamated with Vickers.

Enters South American Field.

After Russia, Zaharoff tackled South America and did still better for his firm. Years passed. The firm grew. England's needs of it grew also, and again it became Zaharoff to do the work in South Africa.

Zaharoff was the providence of British policy from the Balkans to China.

The great war came. And he was able to throw all the capacities and connections of the firm into the service of the allies—the connections were his.

After the war the Greek Venizelos had to be helped in Asia Minor; but the Greeks managed to lose Smyrna and all to the Young Turks.

Only after the war, nevertheless, did the variegated use this man was making with so much money creep into the consciousness of the world's press. He was mixed up with the Lloyd George policies everywhere just as had been the powerful ambassador of the great steel firm all round the world.

Troublesome Donkeys

Salt Lake City, Utah.—Hundreds of wild donkeys roving about the vicinity of Price, Utah, are presenting a bothersome problem to that community, eating all the grass.

Extra! Extra!

New York.—"Daddy" Browning is dieting. He keeps down his waistline by living mostly on raw oats and water.

BUILDS FIGURES PORTRAYING BIBLE

Toledo Man Fashioning Scene of Last Supper.

Toledo, Ohio.—Laboring with trowel and mortar for nearly a decade, Cassius M. Hettinger, Toledo real estate dealer, has surrounded his home with life-size figures portraying Bible lore. He fashions them of concrete and covers them with gleaming shells.

He is engaged now in building a scene of the last supper and estimates it will require several years to mold the twelve disciples and the Master seated around the table.

A deeply religious man, Hettinger declares he received a vision 12 years ago which bade him undertake the work of creating Bible scenes.

Hundreds of tourists annually visit his home on the outskirts of Toledo. He says he has refused many offers to sell the collection of figures.

He traveled for two years from coast to coast seeking a particular shade and size of shell, and finally located the kind he wanted on the beach of Lake Erie several miles from his home.

A life-size camel, being led to water by Zachariah, the tax collector, was the last effigy constructed by him. It required six months' work.

Daniel in the lions' den, and Jacob's well, with Rebecca's pitcher beside it, are other Biblical scenes he has represented.

Almost every inch of the walls of the inside of his home is covered with canvases he has painted in extended trips over the country. At times, he says, he works as long as three days and nights without stopping to sleep. Considered wealthy, Hettinger forsakes his business for months at a time while engaged in creating the Biblical scenes.

Huge Cost in Trade Research Revealed

New York.—Industrial corporations and the federal government are spending about $200,000,000 annually for industrial research, with industry spending $2 for every dollar spent by the government, the National Industrial Conference board announced.

These figures, the board pointed out, do not include the cost of a large amount of technical research work being carried on in connection with industrial production, the cost of which is accounted for as part of production costs.

More than 1,000 companies now operate research divisions, the board said, whereas in 1921 only 578 companies were known to maintain research divisions or laboratories. In addition 70 trade associations are spending about $15,000,000 a year in research and 153 colleges and technical schools spend about $1,500,000.

A public utility corporation spent approximately $13,000,000 last year. Manufacturing companies were found to spend for research an average of from 1 to 3 per cent of the gross amount received from sales, the board said. The greatest amount spent by a single manufacturing company among those from which the board received detailed statements for 1926 was more than $5,250,000.

Data submitted to the board showed that industries whose research expenditures were largest five years ago have scored the greatest relative growth since that time.

Cow Bell Alarm Keeps Thieves From His Auto

Lexington, Ky.—R. T. Long, former constable of this city, has adopted a unique device to keep automobile thieves from stealing his coupe, which in his business of collecting he frequently has occasion to park on the streets of the city.

The device consists of a cow bell, to which is attached a small link chain, which is locked around one of the wheels of his car. Should anybody undertake to move his car he says the cow bell is set to tingling, thus giving an alarm and frightening off the would-be thief. He says that his car has not been molested since he placed the cow bell on it some time ago.

Horseshoe Century Old Found Hidden in Tree

Chicago.—How a steel horseshoe got into the trunk of a great hickory tree, more than one hundred years old, and became embedded there for decades and decades, is a question upon which engineers at a mine near Starved Rock, Ill., are pondering.

Recently John Quick, an engineer at the mine, was cutting the great tree down for firewood. When he had chopped part way through the trunk he struck some impenetrable substance. He resorted to a chisel and when he had split the wood away he found the horseshoe.

It was a well worn and shiny shoe and rather small. It might, the engineer said, have been the shoe from some cavalry mustang. The only explanation the engineers could conjure up was that it might have been thrown about the trunk when the tree was a sapling and that as the tree grew it became embedded in the growing trunk.

MEMORY LOST, LIVES IN NAME OF SLAIN

Soldier Hears Own Tongue, Learns Who He Is.

Stockholm.—The strange story of a Swedish officer named Duner, who lost his memory when wounded while fighting under the British flag and collected a pension under another man's name for ten years, is related by the Swedish press.

Duner was reported killed after the blowing up of a mine a decade ago. Actually he was wounded and lost his memory. A mistake in identity at a hospital caused the Swedish volunteer to be discharged under the name of one De Montalt, a Canadian.

Recently Duner's memory returned and, realizing his Swedish nationality, he came to Stockholm, where he broadcast his story. He got in contact with his mother, widow of a Swedish professor, and she filled in details that he had been unable to recall.

A Soldier of Fortune.

A London dispatch says: A second lieutenant of the royal air force named De Montalt is listed at the ministry of pensions as receiving a life pension for total disability.

The Westminster Gazette gives additional details of the curious case. Gustaf Duner was born in 1880, the son of a professor of Upsala university. He always was fond of military life and obtained a commission in the Swedish army. He resigned to go to South Africa at the outbreak of the Boer war, where he fought in the British army, earning a commission. As there was no prospect of more fighting there, he started on a veritable warrior's tour of Europe, fighting wherever his services were accepted.

Officer in British Army.

At the outbreak of the World war he found himself again a commissioned officer in the British army. Just before New Year's, 1917, happened the adventure which began his decade of mystery. He was sitting in a dugout, when a warning of an imminent explosion came.

He snatched a coat, supposing it was his, and threw himself on the ground, but was lifted high by the explosion. He remembered nothing more, and found himself in a hospital with his memory a total blank. But the doctors and nurses addressed him as "Capt. De Montalt," that being the name on a letter in the pocket of the coat, which he had seized, instead of his own. The real De Montalt was blown to pieces.

A few months later he again was fighting, as Lieutenant De Montalt, in the air force. A crash while flying ended his fighting career, and he was invalided out, receiving a 100 per cent disablement pension.

Making a romantic marriage he lived in London until recently, when his memory returned by accidentally hearing the Swedish language spoken and finding that he could understand it.

Decalogue Revised by Girl for Her Fiance

East Orange, N. J.—With a desire to "make her future husband a better man," Miss Dorothy La Verne Bacher has drawn up a set of commandments which she says will be a joint agreement between the two when they are married.

Miss Bacher, twenty-three, an artist, will announce her engagement to Harold K. Beck of Everett, Mass., and at the same time she will make public the joint contract between the two. Beck, a graduate of Tufts college, is employed in the Washington office of a pump and machinery company. He is twenty-five.

The commandments are:

"Thou shalt have no other mate before me.

"Thou shalt say thy prayers each night on bended knee, particularly asking divine blessing upon our home.

"Thou shalt undertake all family duties on a 50-50 basis, even unto the care of the children, the doing of the dishes and the general housework.

"Thou shalt let naught transpire calculated to arouse my jealousy.

"Thou shalt hold no secrets from me, my right to open all thy mail whatsoever to remain inviolable.

"Thou shalt not consort with John Barleycorn, or flirt with Lady Nicotine or any of her noxious kin.

"Thou shalt be on time for all appointments.

"Thou shalt cater to my whims, not neglect attendance at the theater, opera and dance and other social activities, and always appear neat when in my presence.

"Thou shalt not dwell unduly upon past affairs of the heart, real or imaginary.

"Thou shalt not depart from me without first bestowing a kiss, nor fail to greet me with the same caress."

School Children Save More Than $23,000,000

New York.—Nearly 4,000,000 pupils in the schools of the United States are participating in school savings banking and deposited more than $23,000,000 during the year ended June 30, 1927, according to a statement just issued by the American Bankers' association.

The report says: "Seven years ago, the savings bank division of the American Bankers' association reported 2,736 schools having school savings. As of June 30, 1927, the number is 12,678. The number of pupils participating in school savings has increased from 462,651 to 3,815,785."

The Happiest New Year

By FRANCES MORGAN

NEW YEAR'S EVE — and home earlier than usual, Miriam had stopped at the office. Her letter troubled her. It was from Jere and its single line read:

"Look for me New Year's Eve. Love.—Jere."

Miriam now realized how different was Jere from her new friends — different in every way. Even his shoes, she recalled, in the old days were mud-caked, his corduroy coat snagged and briar-covered.

Mrs. Dalton, at her husband's death, had removed from Oak Hill, their farm, to Middlesboro and the cosy bungalow on Maple street. Miriam had secured a place at the "Palace," Middlesboro's single department store; soon she was the most popular girl there. She liked her new friends immensely—yet, at first, the smiling, tanned face of Jere Mallory, her schoolmate at the little country school, refused to be forgotten.

Jere had driven them from Oak Hill to Middlesboro. "You've always been my sweetheart, Miriam, even when a tiny girl," he'd whispered; "in another year I finish at the agricultural college, then I'm coming back for you."

In Middlesboro Miriam found lots of good times; the young folk took her—her brown eyes and soft, bronze curls—straight to their hearts. The green bungalow soon was the scene of much merriment.

Good looking and suave, Jack Barrington oftener than anyone else "dated up" with Miriam. Jack rushed the new girls and, because his father's business was very good (the "Palace" was the center of trade for the county) and Jack an indulged, only child, the girl he chose to favor was considered lucky.

* * * * * * * *

New Year's Eve. Twelve months had sped since the green bungalow first had known the Daltons.

Hanging up her coat, Miriam turned toward the kitchen, where her mother bustled over the range. "Mums, I've a letter from Jere—he's coming tonight—he—" she tried to stammer that Jere loved her and wanted an answer.

Yet it was of Jack that Miriam was thinking.

"Mums, I've a date tonight with Jack! What shall I do! Jack's temper is dreadful. When he likes a girl he makes a scene if she looks at some one else."

"Selfish pig!" Mrs. Dalton put down the bread basket with a thump

But Miriam was thinking how impossible it would be to give up Jack—Jack, so typical of all she loved—

* * * * * * * *

Jack was in high good humor. He displayed his new overcoat, asking for her opinion (he seemed well enough pleased, himself, for his glance frequently strayed to the mirror). Miriam praised its cut and weave, yet her ears were strained for the crunch of snow outside.

Ah, there it was! A lusty stamping of boots—Mrs. Dalton's cordial words bidding Jere welcome. At the sound of a masculine voice, Jack's face showed surprise and displeasure.

"It's Jere, my—our old friend!" Miriam explained. "he's come to spend New Year's."

"But your date's with me," rasped Jack, glowering at Jere who stood smiling, in the doorway, an arm affectionately about Mrs. Dalton.

"Yes, Jack, dear. but Jere 's our oldest friend—besides he's had this date for a whole year!" Saying this Miriam's smile broke through the mist that blurred her eyes.

"Oh, so that's the game? That being the case—" Jack arose and majestically stalked toward the door which Mrs. Dalton tactfully held open.

It was all rather absurd, of course—and Jere's jolly laugh echoed throughout the bungalow, Mrs. Dalton's merry voice joined in; then Miriam's. Now that it was over it all resembled a "movie" comedy. Still smiling, Mrs. Dalton went in search of the plate of fairy-light "Sally Lunn" baked especially for Jere. She carefully closed the door.

Jere turned and held wide his arms. "Happy New Year, little girl!"—how tenderly he spoke—and what could Miriam do but nestle her bronze curls near his heart?

"Oh, my dear!" the words were a joyful lilt, "the happiest New Year to you, Jere!"

Editor Adam Grant's Daughter

By DOROTHY DOUGLAS

(Copyright.)

OLD Adam Grant, editor and proprietor of one of the great Western newspapers, never wanted it said of him that he gave preference to any member of his own family—in the matter of positions on his staff.

That was why his lovely daughter, Eve, found herself established in a small flat in New York, surrounded by and observing the contents of a hundred and one magazines. Laboriously and very intelligently she was studying the world of fiction from the magazine standpoint.

"When you've mastered the analytical sense and can express it in words that convey your meaning to the readers of my paper—then and only then can you have a position on my staff," Old Adam had told Eve. "If you stay at home here among your friends you won't get anywhere. Hop off to New York for a year and pack that pretty head of yours with first-hand knowledge."

Aunt Clem, her mother's sister, who had come along with her, bored at times into reading the personals in the papers, came across the advertisement that gave her an idea.

It read, "Old magazines wanted by writer." Aunt Clem answered the advertisement and left a huge bundle of magazines to be called for.

Not by the proverbial candle, but beside a well-lighted table, young Avery Weldon carried on his as yet embryonic authorship. But he was working desperately hard to succeed and was reading fiction in the magazines voraciously in order to get a drift with the market.

That was how the huge pile of old magazines happened to be on the floor beside him. He couldn't quite afford to buy all the new ones and his advertisement had brought him many.

Avery scanned the title pages and sat up and rumpled back that smooth gold hair.

"By jove! This is funny!"

Beside the title of the stories were fine marginal notes of criticism, couched in terse but most expressive language.

"Medium. Not bad. Piffle. No point. Wishy-washy. Very good. Why was it given space? Doesn't know men. Needs to study women."

Avery swiftly picked up the publications that had printed his own work and with a somewhat shrinking heart opened the page. Yes, there beside his own story which he had in a moment of stupidity called "Rose of the Desert" he saw the words, "Author in the making, but sadly lacking the human touch."

Avery puffed a bit furiously at his pipe. The nail was hit straight on the head. Avery knew that. A kindly editor had only recently suggested the same thing.

And because a real author must not be strictly conventional or too awfully bound by laws of society, Avery got up, put on his hat and strolled toward the apartment building from whence his magazines had arrived.

The elevator took him up to the fifth floor and there left him. And in another few moments he was standing at an opened door. Aunt Clem herself was out, but Eve had answered his ring.

Avery didn't know what to say now that he was there and with Eve's calm eyes gazing at him he felt that he made rather a sorry story of the incident of buying the old magazines.

But Eve was very nice about it and invited him in.

"I didn't even know my aunt had cleared them out," she said as he followed her into a magazine-strewn room.

"I wanted so desperately to chat with the critic who had jotted those remarks down that I chanced coming here," he said, boyishly. "My dad has given me a year to make good in story writing, bless him," he went on, seeing the kindling interest in Eve's eyes, "and I believe if you'd be so good as to help me, with criticism I could win out."

"I know you could," was Eve's unexpected reply. "I see it somewhere in the deep places of your stories—I would love to help you."

She told him then about her own dad and who he was and all about home, and Avery laughed. Then he pulled a frayed letter from his pocket—a letter written some six months before, and handed it to her.

"Avery, my boy," it ran, "while you're messing about with your writing, just take time to look up Old Adam Grant's daughter. She's gone to New York to make good, too. Fine girl, too, from what her dad says, but then perhaps I say the same to Grant, about my boy—" Eve read no further until she had cast accusing eyes at Avery.

"I like that! Six whole months and you've never even taken the trouble—"

"And darn glad I am, too," said Avery. "If I knew you all this time I doubt if a single story would have left the typewriter—I should have been bumped into a dream so glorious I—oh, I say, Eve, when do we go back home—I'm longing for the time when I can get down to hard work and make use of all this study to do the big work that only you can help me with."

Aunt Clem came in and smiled—she knew a thing or two.

STORY FROM THE START

Handsome, fastidious and wealthy—young St. Croix Creighton awaits his sweetheart at their trysting place. She is fifteen minutes late, this ordinary little Pennsylvania Dutch girl, Meely Schwenckton, but he awaits her eagerly. She is so demurely beautiful, he thinks, but so out of his "class." Despite her seeming innocence and ignorance, she succeeds in keeping him at a distance, to his chagrin.

CHAPTER II

—3—

Meely Schwenckton, hurrying back breathlessly through the October twilight to the farm house, lest the autocratic head of the house get in from the fields ahead of her and become suspicious of her goings-on, seemed to have undergone a transformation since she had left her lover. Not only had she managed, on the way home, to shed her cheap, gaudy frock of blue voile for a trim tailored suit, but also that veil of bovine dullness which her pretty face had worn had been replaced by a soft, bright amusement; her timid bearing, so abjectly expressing a sense of inferiority, was changed to a look of suppressed excitement, an air of intense vitality, which made her recent humility unimaginable.

Reaching the kitchen porch of the farm house, she was brought up short as her hand touched the latch of the door, by the sound of a whining nasal voice within, reproaching and threatening, to the accompaniment of a child's crying.

Meely's hand dropped from the latch and she stood listening, a look in her eyes of mingled distress and disgust.

"When your Pop hears how you done me dirt this after," whined the nasal voice, "oh, but you'll get the good whippin', Lizzie Schwenckton! Oncet I tell him how you run out after school and let me with all the work, mebby you won't ketch it with that there switch he keeps handy! Lettin' me alone here with all the diapers and all the cleanin' and cookin' and his sick wife and baby to tend! Well!—of!—all!—things! Yes, if he don't give you the worst switchin' you ever had, then I don't know the man"

"Ach, Aunt Rosy, don't tell him!" the child's voice begged in gasping sobs. "I'll help you now—I'll do this here whole tub full of washin'—and I'll wash all the supper dishes for you —you can just set and rest yourself—"

"Well, I guess anyhow you'll wash the supper dishes after the smart switchin' you're gettin'! That'll make you spry for a couple days, I guess, if my talkin' at you don't! You needn't to beg me—"

The nasal whine stopped short as the speaker became aware of a third person in the room, though she had not heard the opening of the door. There stood Meely, her back against the kitchen door, looking at Aunt Rosy with those bright, clear eyes of hers that somehow always cowed the woman, giving her, unreasonably, a sense of guilt which she resented. Always she was resolving that she would not let herself be "downed" by this "high-minded hussy" who had no rights in this house anyway.

"I'll show her who's got rights here!" she daily determined.

Yet she found herself just now, as always when confronted by the silent criticism of this girl's confusing regard, trying apologetically to justify herself.

"Mind you what Lizzie done yet! I give her the diapers to wash after school and she run out to play and let 'em. And me with all the cleanin' and the supper to get and my sick sister's broth to make and all—my lands! How kin I get through all when Lizzie runs out after school and won't help?"

The big, warm, cozy kitchen which, like most farm kitchens of Pennsylvania, was also the family living room, was covered by a bright rag carpet, and furnished with a roomy settee against the wall, several big, gayly painted rocking-chairs, a large decorated calendar labeled "Sweet Smiles" hanging from a cuckoo clock, a table spread for supper, a cooking stove on which sausage and potatoes were sizzling.

The Schwenckton family, as well as all the neighboring farm families, had seen this kitchen become transformed in three weeks, under the temporary reign of Aunt Rosy during the confinement of Schwenckton's young wife, from a spotless cleanliness to a messy untidiness and disorder which, in the eyes of the immaculate Pennsylvania Dutch housekeepers, was a scandal next only to immorality and more unheard of. Aunt Rosy's incompetent housekeeping, combined with her autocratic and unamiable attitude towards her sister's stepchildren (from which there was no escape nor appeal, since it was backed up by the Head of the House) had driven the elder son and daughter to rebel and run away; Nettie, the fifteen-year-old girl, having found refuge in the home of her grandmother and Jakey, seventeen years old, having disappeared entirely—to the genuine distress as well as inconvenience of their father to whom Jakey especially had been a great help on the farm. But the other two, Lizzie and Sammy, were too young to escape.

The one soft spot about Aunt Rosy, apparently, was her devotion to her young sister, Susie, Mr. Schwenckton's girl wife, whom she had "raised" from a baby. But although she idolized Susie, she completely dominated her. In all things Susie followed her elder sister's advice and judgment and obeyed her, when she was with her, as much now as when, before her marriage, she had lived in Rosy's home. Susie was the only person in the world who did not find Rosy repulsive.

Ten-year-old Lizzie, a thin, delicate-looking child, was working frantically at a wash-tub at the far end of the cluttered, dirty kitchen, crying hysterically while she worked, terrified of the punishment hanging over her.

Meely, going across the room to hang her jacket on a rack on the wall, spoke over her shoulder in reply to Aunt Rosy's complaints, her pleasant tone and manner betraying none of the loathing she felt towards the woman. "But since you didn't do the cleaning, Aunt Rosy (look at this kitchen!) nor the diapers, and kept Sammy home from school to wait on Susie, what have you done all day? And Mr. Schwenckton won't like it, you know, that you're having the diapers washed here in the kitchen where we have to eat—"

It is to be noted that Meely's accent and diction were not now so studiously Pennsylvania Dutch as when she had talked with St. Croix Creighton a half hour ago. The hint of foreignness in her speech was not that of the Pennsylvania Dutch at all.

A heavy step on the porch at this instant was followed by the opening of the kitchen door and the entrance of the farmer in overalls.

Lizzie's crying was instantly choked back while she bent to her work more frantically than ever; and Aunt Rosy acquired suddenly a great air of industry about the stove and table.

Mr. Schwenckton, closing the door behind him, stood surveying with disgust the disorder and dirt of the kitchen.

A big, red-faced man of mild, though obstinate, countenance, he looked so good-natured that one might have wondered why his children were so afraid of him. But family discipline among the Pennsylvania Dutch is a religion; "spare the rod and spoil the child," a dogma. Mr. Schwenckton had ever tried to perform his whole duty by the children God had given him to rear for His honor and glory in a heavenly home, the Scriptural prescription for accomplishing this being the only means he knew, disagreeable as he often found it—for he was withal an affectionate father; not naturally severe; only very conscientious; obstinate in the performance of what he saw to be his duty, however difficult.

"Yi, yi, yi!" he shook his head and frowned at the dirty kitchen, "but you're the dopple of a housekeeper, Aunt Rosy! You ain't the nice housekeeper your little sister Susie is. Well, I guess anyhow not! Yi, yi, if the neighbors seen our kitchen so throughother yet!"

"Yes, well, but when I tell you oncet how Lizzie won't help along when I tell her to," his sister-in-law complained as she began to dish up sausage and fried potatoes, while Mr. Schwenckton went to the sink to wash his hands, "you'll see for yourself, Mister, how I can't get through all by myself. Lizzie she run—"

"Lizzie!" the farmer broke in, raising his voice above the running water, "stop that splashin' at the tub and come now to your supper."

"Ye-yes, sir," the child stammered, her teeth almost chattering. As she dried her hands on her apron and came to the table, Aunt Rosy gave her a look as who should say, "You just wait! Don't think because he cut me short that I ain't tellin' on you! You just wait!"

"Where's Sammy?" asked Mr. Schwenckton.

"Upstairs settin'," his sister-in-law told him as she carried the food from the stove to the table. "With Susie. Susie she's too poorly to be let alone, whiles I gotta be down here."

Mr. Schwenckton shook his head dolefully, his face, as it emerged from the roller-towel, looking deeply troubled.

"Well, come everybody now and set. I want to get eat and hurry up to Susie."

During the long "blessing" invoked by the head of the house, after they were all seated, Meely's was the only head unbowed. The expression of her face (while fulsome words of gratitude were directed to the throne of God) suggested anything but thankfulness as she surveyed the platter of sausage, floating in a lake of grease, the burnt potatoes, the pale, heavy pie.

At the "Amen" she rose at once, went to a cupboard and brought back to the table a fresh napkin for herself.

The temporary housekeeper spoke up in self-defense against the implied criticism of this gesture on Meely's part. "Well, if I did forget your napkin again, I must say I wasn't raised to eat so hoggish myself that I need a napkin to my meals!"

"You've got no need, Aunt Rosy," her brother-in-law mildly admonished her, "to speak so unpolite. Us we all know," he added as they all began to help themselves, each one for himself, as was their custom, "that Meely was raised more refined than us."

"Well, I wouldn't go so far as to say that, Mister," Aunt Rosy resentfully objected. "To call myself common yet toward what she is! I ain't belittlin' myself that much! I cert'nly consider myself as good as other ones; and so I likewise consider your poor, sweet, little wife, Sam Schwenckton! If she'd heerd you'd compared her to this here stranger and sayed she was common toward what this here stranger is—"

"Ach, Aunt Rosy, be peaceable," Mr. Schwenckton checked this whining tirade. "Meely ain't ezackly a stranger to us, even if we didn't get acquainted with her till here this fall. You can't call a cousin a stranger yet!"

"You ain't got no proof she's your cousin. She don't look like as if she's your cousin. Nor act or speak like none of your cousins I ever met up with."

"Yes, well, you never met up with none of the Berks County Schwencktons. They're different, too, again from us Schwencktons here in Dauphin county. They're better educated that way and more refined. Meely," he addressed their boarder, his tone anxious, his eyes worried, "how do you think my Susie is today?"

"She can't get better so long as you keep her room dark and don't air it, Mr. Schwenckton. Air and light are all she needs to get well."

"Yes, well, but I don't hold with them doctors that says it's unsanitarium to keep the windahs shut and the room dark when you're sick," Mr. Schwenckton pronounced conclusively—and from a conclusion once reached, a position once taken, the power did not exist that could move Sam Schwenckton.

He drew a deep sigh. "I did hope Susie was gettin' better for me after her lookin' so bright yesterday."

"The reason she was so much brighter and better yesterday," said Meely, "was because when Aunt Rosy was taking a nap, I covered Susie and the baby with blankets and aired the room! Threw open all the doors and windows and left them open for an hour! Then I washed Susie and changed her nightgown and the bed linen. She and the baby slept after that for four hours! That's why she was better yesterday."

Red Blood Cells in Human Being Vital.

Ever since the red blood cells were first seen in the circulating blood more than 100 years ago, scientists have been endeavoring to determine such facts as the amount of blood flowing in the veins and in the arteries of the average person, and the number of red blood cells. Indeed, accurate measurements of temperature, pulse rate, breathing rate and other measurable factors are of the greatest importance in measuring the extent or nature of disease. Obviously all of these determinations are subject to human error associated with the one who makes the observations and with defects of apparatus that is used for making of the important measurements.

The number of red blood cells is important particularly in relationship to such diseases as pernicious and secondary anemias. When the number is considerably below 4,500,000 per cubic millimeter, the person is likely to breathe with difficulty and have little vitality or resistance to disease. In a figure as large as 5,000,000, a variation of 10,000 does not make a considerable difference. However, larger variations are of importance.—Dr. Morris Fishbein, in the Scientific American.

A total of 43 votes were sufficient to elect a mayor, six city councillors and other officers in Greenville, S. C. The potential electorate of that city is 5,000.

A Communication

To the Editor:

I was informed a short time ago that the depositors of the old Holt State Bank, which was closed May 23, 1922, may as well forget about their claims as there have been no dividends paid nor never would be. Why are closed banks surrounded with so much secrecy, and why are the depositors not permitted to have anything to say or do about the liquidation of the bank's affairs?

During the five-and-a-half years the bank has been closed, there have been three receivers in charge, all drawing fat salaries, and judging from the way the assets of the bank are being swallowed up, it looks as though the creditors will never receive a cent. But I want to say that if the men in charge had done their duty, there would at least have been a dividend paid.

The fault lies with the people also. Our sob squad is ever present to plead for the criminal, not for the innocent who suffer at the hands of thieves and murderers. It is time the people got a hand in the game. If the innocent and upright must die, let them die fighting for what is right, not like rabbits at the hands of murderers.

Yours very truly,
ANTON ANDERSON

CROP YIELD ABOVE 10-YEAR AVERAGE

Improved Agricultural Condition Is Reported.

Washington.—Continuation of the improved agricultural situation as compared with last year was announced by the Department of Agriculture to be in progress recently when a review of conditions was made.

"The general course of prices of farm products has been slightly downward recently," the review said, "but other commodities have also declined slightly, so that the October index of purchasing power of farm products in terms of non-agricultural commodities remained at 92 per cent of pre-war, compared with 81 per cent in October last year."

The general yield of crops has been brought up above the ten-year average by the mild fall weather, it was stated, but production this year is about 3 per cent less than last year.

Discussing the situation by regions, the department said weather in the East had been favorable for fall work and wheat was reported to be showing good stands.

Drought in the eastern part of the South has made germination and growth of winter crops very poor, as was also the case to some extent in Texas. The Middle Southern states have been more favored and the general condition of the South is apparently improved over last year.

Much soft corn is reported in the eastern portion of the corn belt, some of which, it was stated, will not even make feed. General conditions in the winter wheat belt are reported the best in five or six years in the North, but not greatly different from last year in the southern part of the belt.

"The range country is going into winter, for the most part, with an abundance of feed and with stock in excellent condition," said the department.

"The cattle industry shows every evidence of stimulation; restocking ranges, cows high priced, good income from this fall's shipments of both feeder and slaughter stock.

"The sheep industry likewise is optimistic, Western feeding areas running twice as many lambs as last year. The whole picture for the mountain states is a favorable one."

German Suicide Rate Shows Big Increase

Berlin.—The number of suicides in Germany has increased even compared with the rate during the post-war inflation period, according to the latest statistics. Stabilization of the nation's currency has not lessened individual financial distress, the principal cause of voluntary death. In 1925 there were 15,273 deaths compared with 13,145 in 1923, the height of the inflation period.

With an annual suicide rate of 2.3 to every 10,000 persons, Germany comes third after Hungary with 2.7, and Czechoslovakia with 2.6. Switzerland and Austria follow close on Germany with 2.4 suicides out of every 10,000 inhabitants.

At the better end, Greece leads with only two suicides to every 100,000, or less than one-tenth the number in Germany. Other favorable rates are Ireland, 3 to 100,000; Spain, 4; Lithuania, 5, and Italy, 9. The figure for Ireland is for the Irish Free State. In North Ireland there are exactly twice as many self-murders, or 6 to every 100,000 inhabitants.

Sweden with 14 suicides to every 100,000 unit has more than double the rate in Norway, where there are but 6.

When Does a Fish Die? Query of German Court

Berlin.—A trial for cruelty to a fish brought up the question whether fish are only stunned by a blow on the head or killed outright, so that their subsequent movements are mere reflexes.

Fraulein Dorothy Heinze, seventy, who is a great lover of cats, bought a live fish for her pets and instructed the fishmonger, C. Berisch, to kill and prepare it for cooking on the spot. After the vendor of sea food had deftly delivered a smashing blow on the head of the fish, he started to scrape off the scales.

When she saw the fish still squirming in the man's hand, the old woman emitted a scream of horror, called him a brute and subsequently had him arraigned in the Charlottenburg court "for wanton cruelty."

The court, finding itself incompetent to judge of the vitality of fishes, called in two piscatorial experts, who testified that after a properly delivered blow on the head a fish is as dead as a door nail and that its continuing motions are purely reflectory in character.

Oil Well Drillers Find Gay-Lined Earth

Haskell, Okla.—Geologists are unable to explain the appearance of earth formations of various colors found in the drilling of an oil well on the O. B. Grayson farm near here.

The first strange formation was a green mud. Deeper drilling brought forth sands and limes rivaling all colors of the rainbow. Specimens have been sent to laboratories for examination.

An Eastern paint manufacturing company has obtained samples of the earth, hoping to find material useful in the production of paint.

BOY THOUGHT DEAF IS TRAINED TO HEAR

"Talked" in Pantomime Until Taken to School.

Indianapolis.—Whether a sturdy little youngster brought to them as a mute is really deaf and lacking the powers of speech, as his parents believe, is a matter which teachers of School No. 9, Vermont and Davidson streets, are trying to determine through methods employed in the atypical department of the institution.

The child, who is six, too young to enter the Indiana School for the Deaf, was brought by his parents, both mutes, to the school in hope that he might be educated. His two sisters are mutes, and because the two always talked in pantomime, he was thought also to be a mute. He was put in charge of a teacher in the room known as atypical B which is provided for beginning pupils who are particularly backward and unable to keep pace with the average child of that age.

Finds Boy Can Hear.

The first thing the teacher learned was that the boy could hear, though with some difficulty. This led her to believe that he might be taught to articulate. The fact that he never had, might be attributed to a psychological rather than a physical cause, she believed, inasmuch as all his life he had been associated with mutes.

On the assumption that the child could be taught to understand and express himself in the English language, the teacher first began instruction in lip-reading. As a pupil, he showed unusual attentiveness and quickness of perception. Within nine days he had learned the meaning of nearly a score of words which he understood from the motion of the teacher's lips. Heretofore, he could comprehend ideas only through pantomime such as he employed.

Assured of success in this direction, the teacher set about determining how much the youngster could hear. She found that he responded to sound. As she continued to work with him, his hearing seemed to grow better and now he hears sufficiently to understand four words — "boy," "girl," "shoe" and his name. In order to explain to his teacher just how he heard and felt the sound of a piano note when she struck it, he pointed first to the floor, then his shoe, his body and his ear.

Shows Normal Tendencies.

In meeting the problem of teaching him to talk, the teacher first began by saying and in turn having him pronounce after her three vowels. This he does with an enunciation that is surprising in view of his history. She has forbidden him to attempt to say words, as his parents have tried to get him to do in their unintelligible way.

That the youngster has a keen sense of humor is evinced in his association with his teacher whom he has learned to love and obey eagerly, and with his classmates. He is endowed with the usual tendencies of the normal American boy to put himself in the right. When he got in a fight recently with a taller boy in the room in the teacher's absence, he made it evident in pantomime gestures to the school principal, Miss Kate Mason, that the bigger boy pushed him down, forcing him to defend himself.

The case is being watched with considerable interest by the school. Whether the teacher and Miss Jeanette Williams, in charge of the atypical work of the city schools, have correctly analyzed the situation and whether their efforts meet with success remain to be seen within the next few months.

German Scientists Find Secrets of Hittites

Berlin.—Secrets from the lives of the Hittites who lived in the period 3,000 years B. C. are expected to be revealed after German scientists have studied the mammoth collection of stone statues and tablets excavated by Baron Max von Oppenheim in the depths of Mesopotamia.

The collection now en route to Berlin is declared to be the most important key ever found to the customs and habits of a practically unknown era.

Among the colossal figures found are a number of weird heathen gods; some animal figures with human heads; well preserved tablets depicting hunting and religious scenes, and some perfect examples of colorful ceramic jars.

Though mentioned in the Bible, the Hittites of 5,000 years ago have always been a puzzle to the archeologists, particularly since a group of tablets containing picture writings belonging to 1000 B. C. have never been deciphered.

Pigeons Make Nest From Stolen Metal

London.—The management of a firm of iron and steel merchants was greatly puzzled over the mysterious pilferings of bicycle spokes, fragments of iron and small pieces of sheet metal from the yard.

A close watch was kept, and the thieves detected. They proved to be pigeons, and they used the metal for their nest. Their home was 16 inches high and weighed 22 pounds.

5,000 FROM AMERICA TO MOVE TO EGYPT

Will Try Living Under Ancient Laws.

San Francisco. — Five thousand American men, women and children plan to move to an ancient Egyptian city by the Nile and prove they can live there harmoniously and progressively without benefit of modern conveniences. This was the announcement made by Dr. H. Spencer Lewis, national president of the Rosecrucian Order, a philosophical cult.

Doctor Lewis declared plans were being made to have the expedition sail late next year.

The city of Tel-el-Amarna, sun city of Amenhotep the fourth, founder of the Rosecrucian Order, is the site picked for the experiment, Doctor Lewis said. The expedition will contain an approximate even number of men and women, all carefully selected for their physical fitness and devotion to the principles of the teachings under which they are to live.

"There will also be several children," Doctor Lewis said. "Establishment of families will be encouraged."

The colony will abandon modern dress for costume of the ancient Egyptians and will forsake mechanical implements for the crude tools of 1300 B. C. They are to live according to the principles propounded by Amenhotep in an effort to demonstrate that these laws have not lost their value for the human race.

Reopening of Old Mines Spooky Job for Workers

McAdoo, Pa.—Days when miners worked for 90 cents a day instead of the present minimum of $5.30 daily were recalled at Sayre colliery, between here and Mt. Carmel, recently, when the old Aristes section of the Sayre mines was reopened. Idle for 40 years, during which time the workings were allowed to collapse and timbers to decay, the presence of coal that could not be recovered in the days of primitive mining has resulted in the Lehigh Valley Coal company arranging to again work the gangways and to pull the pillars left when the mine was abandoned two generations ago.

Miners find this reopening of old workings a "spooky" task and do not like it. Taking the water out after 40 years leaves long strands of chemical "slush" hanging from the roofs and when the miners walk into these hangings in the dark they get a thrill that is hard to stand.

At Aristes slope they found a car of coal that had been loaded by miners who left it in the workings and never took it out, nor were paid for it. Standing in acid mine water for 40 years did not destroy the vehicle. One wheel was corroded through and the tracks on which it stood still are there, rusty streaks, but still some metal in them. Pipes of miners who walked out and forgot their belongings also have been discovered and even dinner cans, containing moldy bread and meat, have been found.

Find Dried Egg Diet Brings Death to Rats

London. — Interesting new facts about food keep coming to light from research in nutrition. Dried whites of eggs when included in the diet of rats produces a curious new type of disease, Dr. Margaret A. Boas of the Lister institute has found.

"After two or three weeks red scaly patches appear at the corners of the animal's mouth, the coat becomes rough and sticky, and the long hairs fall out. The red patches then spread, and the baldness increases. There are also nervous symptoms. In all cases the rats lose weight progressively and soon die, although rats on the same diet but with fresh instead of dried egg-white live quite contentedly in perfect health."

Doctor Boas does not consider that the disease is caused by a toxic substance but believes that it is due to the deficiency of some essential food factor which is probably destroyed when the egg white is dried. The dried egg white can be rendered quite harmless, she has found, by adding some other substances to the diet, such as potatoes or arrowroot.

X-Ray Brings Cancer Victim Back to Work

New York.—Swan Abramson, who is known as "The Wizard of Hicksville," celebrated his restoration to health by opening a shop for the sharpening of scissors, saws and lawn mowers, it was announced by the American Society for the Control of Cancer.

Two years ago Abramson was suffering from cancer of the stomach and was saved through an adroit operation and a rare display of courage on his part.

"Cancer," said Abramson at his shop in Hicksville, "is a disease which never can be conquered as long as men and women refuse to face the facts. Many of the ideas which people hold about cancer seem to have been handed down from the Dark ages. Everyone should learn the danger signals and get the best medical attention procurable from the first sign. Many can be cured if they will act promptly and thus meet the doctors half way. Nobody should give up hope. I owe my recovery to surgery and X-rays and a stubborn unwillingness to give up."

The Play

IN TAKING up this part of the subject we shall consider the play of the adversaries first and then that of the declarer.

During the bidding we designate the players as dealer, second, third, and fourth hands; but when the bidding closes the player winning the bid becomes the declarer, his partner is the dummy and the other two players are called the adversaries or opponents.

For the sake of convenience in describing the play, each adversary has been given a special name. The one on the declarer's left who opens the play by leading first is called "senior" and his partner is called "junior," and these names will be used in the remainder of the present articles.

Senior's Play to a Declared Trump

Senior's first lead to a trump declaration may be from a suit in which his partner has shown strength by bidding; or he may open a suit of his own. No rule can be given as to which of these he should do except to say that he should start the suit in which he thinks there is the greatest probability of their winning several tricks. If he has a good suit of his own, especially when holding the top honors, he should begin with that.

Against a declared trump—which we are now considering—the adversaries seldom make more than their aces and kings because the plain suits so often are trumped by the declarer on the third round. Therefore, a suit of three or four cards headed by Ace and King makes a much better opening than a longer suit headed by King or Queen. It is difficult to say in a few words just which card to lead from all of the multitudinous combinations which occur. Many Auction Bridge books give a long list which the student is expected to follow.

Inasmuch as it is particularly hard for beginners to learn such a list, we shall give a few simple rules which will be of great assistance, and then a short list of combinations in the order of their desirability.

When holding the highest cards of a suit, they should of course be led because there could be no possible reason for leading low; but when not holding the high ones, one often should lead low in an effort to bring them out and make a King or Queen good. In general we may say to lead high when holding Ace or any three honors; but to lead low from most other combinations. In a declared trump the Ace always should be led first if it is present in the suit which is to be opened. This is because the declarer may hold but one of that suit in one of his two hands, or he may be able to discard several cards so that when the ace is led later in the game he can trump it. This lead is not made when playing a no trump; therefore it will bear repeating in another form "never underlead an ace in a declared trump."

When holding three honors not including the ace lead the top of a sequence like King-Queen-Jack, or Queen-Jack-Ten. If they are not in sequence lead the top of the two that are touching; that is, from King-Jack-Ten, lead the Jack, or from King-Queen-Ten, lead the King.

For the Ace-King combination there is a special convention or agreement, according to which the king should be led first, then followed by the Ace when holding others in the suit; but the Ace should be led first and followed by the King when holding no others in the suit. The object of this is to inform your partner in the latter case that you have no more of that suit and would like to have him lead it to you if he can before your trumps have been extracted, so that you may trump it.

When holding Ace, King and Queen, lead King first and follow with the queen. This procedure is just as sure of taking the first two tricks and in addition it tells your partner that you hold the Ace; while if you lead the Ace second you would not convey any information regarding the Queen.

In a declared trump the lead also should be high when holding two honors not including the Ace provided those two are in sequence; thus from King, Queen and small ones the King should be led; from Jack, Ten and others the jack is the proper lead.

When not holding Ace or two honors in sequence a low card should be led, and when leading low the fourth best card is always chosen.

The reason for its being the fourth best rather than the lowest or any low card is because we can apply a rule called the "Rule of Eleven" to the lead of the fourth best card which will give us information regarding the other cards of that suit. The rule of eleven is: "If the number of spots on the card led (fourth best of leader's suit) be subtracted from eleven it will tell the number of cards in that suit above the one led which are in the other three hands."

Salesmanship or Love

By FRANCES COWLES

(Copyright.)

JUSTINE CARR was certainly not made of the stuff whereof good salesmanship is compounded. But it was absolutely necessary for her to go to work that summer and the only job available that promised more than a bare living was this job of taking orders for women's gingham dresses. It was in the real country where she got most orders, but there she had to walk endlessly to get to the next house. Really she ought to have had a flivver—but that was out of the question for Justine.

One very hot day in July she was "doing" the country section near Melrose. She had spent a day and a half without a single order and she had to pay for a night's lodging in Melrose besides. Justine wore a fresh pink frock herself. One of the sort that sold for $2.98. She looked so fresh and pretty in that inexpensive dress that women seemed to want to buy one like it. But the woman at the last farm house had slammed the door in her face and she had walked a good half mile to the next house. She rang an old-fashioned door bell. After waiting quite a while the door was opened and there appeared a very warm looking young man holding a frying pan in one hand and a broom under his arm.

"Good morning," said Justine, using the most ingratiating tone of voice. "May I have just a word with your wife?"

"You could if I had one," said the young man bluntly.

"I should have known," said Justine—"then the lady of the house."

"The lady of the house, if that's what you call her, has gone to Europe. Personally I think she was no lady."

"Maybe there's some other lady here," purred Justine. "You see, I'm taking orders for gingham dresses. This is one I'm wearing—it cost only $2.98."

The young man whistled. "Gee," he said, "it looks like a hundred dollars to me. But I'm sorry there isn't a lady or a woman in the whole house. If there was I wouldn't be doing this."

"Well, I'm sorry," said Justine, throwing aside her suave manner. "About how far is it to the next house in that direction?" She waved her hand toward the dusty road beyond.

"About a mile," said the young man. "You don't mean you're taking it on foot! Great Scott! That's terrible!"

"Oh, I don't mind the walk—only no one seems to want to order any dresses."

"That certainly is a fine dress you're wearing," he said, and then: "Say, it occurs to me that maybe I might order some—I know my sister would like them. You come on in and get a drink of ice water."

They went into the cool, spacious living room—not at all the sort of living room that Justine had found in other farm houses.

"You see my sister wanted to go abroad with her husband," the young man called from the kitchen while he was getting the water, and then resumed as he came in the living room, "and she asked me to come out and hold the house down. She had a cook and another girl—said they had promised to stay. You see there are three children. Well, I was going to spend two months writing a survey of an expedition I took in South America last winter. I thought I could do my work here as well as anywhere. I managed all right until last week. Then the girls had a row with each other and it ended by their both leaving. They hate it off here in the country. I can't get any one to come out and help me for love or money. I'm doing all the work."

There was a pause and then the young man and Justine spoke at once and each said, "I was thinking—" Peter said that he was thinking that he could get away long enough to drive Justine on up to the next farm house. It was a shame to think of her walking on such a day and Justine said with some confusion that she was thinking that if Peter really did need a woman to work for him she would be willing to take the position. "I can cook and wash dishes and look after the children," she said. "It's hard, but it wouldn't be so hard as walking endlessly over country roads, and it couldn't be less profitable."

So Justine stayed. She just took off her hat and went out into the kitchen, found an apron and began washing dishes. Later she sent home for a few belongings. Peter insisted on paying her the salary that had been left for the two maids who had departed—because as a matter of fact she was doing as much as they both had done—and Peter was left undisturbed to work on his survey. Only sometimes he chose to go out into the kitchen and dry dishes with Justine. One day he told her he loved her. He finished drying a plate and then said he wanted to marry her. Justine went on washing dishes. Then he put down the dish and pulled her, with her hands all covered with soapsuds and dripping with water, and held her in his arms.

"But just think what a shock it would be to your sister to come home and find that you'd got engaged to the cook."

"Well, then, let's spare their feelings. Let's get married—and when they come home I'll just say that I got married and my wife came home to help hold the house down."

Safety on Air Liners

Nine men jumped out of a big airplane in 18 seconds and all landed safely. Air liners will have to carry parachutes for passengers just as ocean liners carry life preservers. It won't be exactly pleasant to jump out of an airship at an altitude of 1,000 feet and trust to get safely to earth, but then, it isn't pleasant to jump off an ocean-liner in midocean and trust to a life preserver or a rubber raft to get you safely to shore. —Capper's Weekly.

STORY FROM THE START

Handsome, fastidious and wealthy—young St. Croix Creighton awaits his sweetheart at their trysting place. She is fifteen minutes late, this ordinary little Pennsylvania Dutch girl, Meely Schwenckton, but he awaits her eagerly. She is so demurely beautiful, he thinks, but so out of his "class." Despite her seeming innocence and ignorance, she succeeds in keeping him at a distance, to his chagrin. Meely, in the Schwenckton home, where she is boarding, is altogether unlike the girl who meets St. Croix clandestinely, and her speech has little of the Pennsylvania Dutch accent.

Mr. Schwenckton looked sternly disapproving. "You hadn't ought to heist windahs where a person's layin' sick!" he reaffirmed, and Aunt Rosy added her horrified prophecy: "Yes, soon you'll have another wife dead on you, Mister, with such goings-on as soon as my back is turned around behind me oncet!"

"Susie would be up and about in a week if you kept her room aired and clean," Meely imperturbably affirmed, "and the baby, too, would pick up. There's nothing the matter with the baby except that it's not properly taken care of, Mr. Schwenckton."

"Yes, well, but when a body's sick, or for babies," Mr. Schwenckton repeated, "we don't hold to openin' windahs on 'em."

"Susie's bed was plenty clean as it was!" declared Rosy. "It didn't need changin' till another week yet. It makes me too much work, such behaviors does! And Susie's too sick fur Meely to take and wash her! Of—all—things! Washin' a person when they're sick yet!"

Meely's reception of this criticism was as impersonal as though it were being directed toward anyone but herself. Her whole attitude to this family, her very presence here, seemed tentative, experimental. When she was not regarding them with wide-eyed wonder and curiosity, her face was expressing suppressed amusement, or pity, or impatience; sometimes bewilderment; sometimes the interested suspense one might feel at a "movie" or a play.

Their attitude to her, however, was entirely matter-of-fact. Evidently they took her quite for granted, as she certainly did not take them.

Just now her alert observation took in the fact that Mr. Schwenckton's anxious glance was resting with affectionate concern on Lizzie's red eyes; that he was aware of her desperate effort to repress the little gasping catching of her breath which betrayed her recent violent crying; that he saw she was not eating any supper.

Reaching across the table, he took her plate, piled it with food and handed it back to her. "Eat your supper, Lizzie," he ordered in a tone that for him was a caress. "We can't have no more sick folks here."

"Ye-yes, sir." Though the food strangled her, she would have to obey and eat it to the last crumb when her father so ordered.

Aunt Rosy never missed a chance to disparage Meely in Sam Schwenckton's eyes; for she felt that if she could get rid of this objectionable girl, as she had gotten rid of Nettie and Jakey, the two older children of the family, she would hold the situation in hand, here in her young sister's home, with much more confidence.

"So you took another of them long walks of yourn again today, Meely, ain't?" she just now remarked insinuatingly. "Seems so funny walkin' just fur the sake of walkin'! Ain't, Sam? I guess," Aunt Rosy nodded knowingly, "she goes to meet her fellah!"

This bait elicited no reply from Meely, though it manifestly touched Mr. Schwenckton's curiosity a bit and even Lizzie's sickly interest.

"But why," continued Aunt Rosy, "are you so secret about it if you're got a fellah? You're welcome, I'm sure, to keep comp'ny here in the front room. Ain't, Sam? You're got no need to meet him secret that way. It don't look nice. Looks like as if you had somepin to hide yet! Ain't, Sam?"

"I can't think," responded Mr. Schwenckton reflectively, "of any fellah 'round here that wouldn't be too common for Meely."

"Ach, I don't know. She ain't so much, so far forth as I can see," Aunt Rosy frankly stated, "even if she is high-educated that way."

"The only educated young men 'round here is the two Creightons, and to be sure," said Mr. Schwenckton, "they only run with swells."

"Creightons?" repeated Meely inquiringly.

"Yes. They're away-up folks, them Creightons. They're 'ristocratics, they are. Grand folks. None better. Even the swells that lives in town ain't nothin' much to the Creightons—they're got so much, the Creightons has."

"'So much'? Money, you mean, of course?"

"To be sure. What else?"

"Well, I thought you might mean education or brains or even character—interesting things."

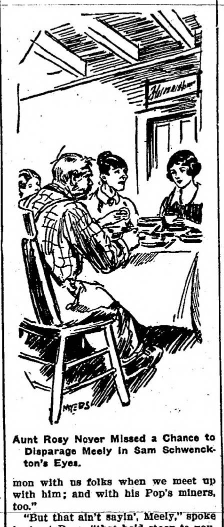
"Yes, well, they're got all them things too."

"Have they?"

"Ach, yes, they're wery grand college-educated that way, them two Creightons. And the younger one, St. Croix, he's wery proud and high-minded; wonderful high-minded! Marvin, the older one, he ain't so proud. He's different to what St. Croix is."

"How is he different?" asked Meely, disguising under an elaborate indifference her excited interest. Much as she had longed to ask questions about the Creightons, she had never dared risk it, so she was elated that, without any maneuvering on her part, the talk should be taking this interesting turn.

"Well," answered Mr. Schwenckton, "Marvin makes hisself nice and common with us folks when we meet up with him; and with his Pop's miners, too."



Aunt Rosy Never Missed a Chance to Disparage Meely in Sam Schwenckton's Eyes.

"But that ain't sayin', Meely," spoke in Aunt Rosy, "that he'd stoop to you. He ain't that common!"

"Isn't he?"

"Yes, well, but he might stoop even to such as Meely," Mr. Schwenckton speculated, "since his Pop turned him out to earn his own livin'."

"Oh! Why?" asked Meely breathlessly, off her guard for an instant in her surprise and curiosity.

"Well, he don't hold with his Pop about the way their miners is treated. He puts out that he thinks it's like Roosha under the czar. He's fur treatin' 'em like Roosha under the Bolsheviks. So him and his Pop they don't hit it off so wery good. He tol' his Pop (so it's put out) that he couldn't live on money so earnt. So then his Pop tol' him to get out and earn his own livin' and see how he'd like it."

"Then the other son, St. Croix, will inherit all his father's wealth, will he?" asked Meely. "Or are there other heirs?"

"Them's all. But the estate is entailed, that way, and Marvin must get his share, too, till his Pop's deceased a'ready. That's what gets old Creighton so peeved, that he can't disinherit his son; for he says that Marvin, with his Bolshevist vee-yous, will ruin their business—his own share and St. Croix' too, seein' it's all together. Yes, Marvin he's an awful worry to his Pop!"

"And to his brother, St. Croix, too, I should think?" Meely suggested.

"Ach, yes, it's put out that the brothers don't get on good together at all. Then there's other troubles, too, between Marvin and his Pop—about a second cousin in England with such a title—a duke-ess or what—that Marvin was to marry and he got balky and wouldn't do it. It seems he tol' his Pop he wouldn't buy his wife nor he wouldn't sell hisself fur no titled lady in the world, nor he wouldn't marry no girl that would sell herself for his money."

"And was he sure," Meely asked, after an instant's pause, "that his English cousin wanted to sell herself?"

"Well, that's the talk. The two families had fixed up the match and Marvin he got balky. And his Pop was awful peeved, he'd been so set on this here match. Marvin bein' the oldest was gave the first chance at this here grand lady, you see, and wouldn't take it. So now it's St. Croix that's to marry her, they say."

"Is he?"

"So they say. And I guess it's better so, for he's more suited to such a duke-ess, or what. Marvin's too plain a dresser for such a high lady."

"And how," asked Meely after another moment's silence, "does this Marvin earn his living since he's been thrown out by his father?"

"Yes, you better ask, Meely! He's your boss! He's got hisself elected county superintendent of our public schools!"

"What!"

"Yes, mind if he didn't! So he'll be wisitin' at your school one of these here days to see how you teach oncet!"

"Does he know anything about teaching, himself?" asked Meely skeptically.

"Well, he's got a college diarploma, or what."

"And the younger son—St. Croix—he agrees with his father, I suppose, about the treatment of the miners?"

"Ach, yes, him and his Pop agrees fine. He's the lawyer for the estate and his Pop thinks he's fine and sharp. Lizzie," he spoke to his little daughter, "eat your supper."

"It don't wonder me she don't eat," said Aunt Rosy; "her conscience won't leave her enjoy her wittles, so bad—"

"Be peaceable, Aunt Rosy. You can tell me after supper what you're got to say."

The child looked terrified at these ominous words and Meely glanced at her pityingly. For a moment no one spoke and the silence seemed heavy and menacing.

"Well," Mr. Schwenckton presently broke it, "I'm done." He pushed away his plate, drew the back of his hand across his mouth, shoved back his chair and rose. "I'll go up and see Susie."

Aunt Rosy, who was a greedy eater, at once concluded her own supper with a few hasty mouthfuls and rose to go with him. "Lizzie!" she spoke over her shoulder from the stairway opening out from the kitchen, "you get at and clear off the table and do the dishes and then finish up them diapers."

"Yes'm," answered Lizzie, rising at once and beginning to scrape and collect the plates.

A moment later Sammy, a cowed and sullen boy of twelve, skulked into the kitchen, sat down at the table and began hungrily devouring his belated supper.

Meely strolled to the foot of the stairs and stood listening to the voices in the room above; and Lizzie, her eyes wide and strained, left the sink and tiptoed across the room to stand at her side.

"Lizzie she won't obey to me," Aunt Rosy's complaining voice came down from the sick room. "I can't do nothin' with her. After school this after she run out and stayed till near supper time a'ready! If you don't learn your children to obey to me, Mister, I can't housekeep for you, and then where'd you be, with a sick wife and a boarder that's that pertikkler! —wantin' a napkin to every meal yet! —and interferin' and makin' Susie worse with lettin' in the cool air where she's layin' here sick! Well—of—all—things!"

"And, Sam," Susie's weak voice backed up her sister, "Meely she encourages Lizzie to disobey to my sister Rosy. I misoverheard her sayin' to Lizzie, 'It's a pity you ain't old enough to do like your sister and brother done—run off!' Yes, mind you, Sam, if she didn't tell Lizzie that!"

"Yi, yi, yi!" Mr. Schwenckton's deep voice responded in strongest disapproval.

"Yes, and if you don't get rid of your fancy boarder, Mister, you will have another of your children runnin' off, now mind I'm warnin' you!" said Aunt Rosy.

"Ach, no, no!" Mr. Schwenckton returned in a tone of mingled distress and resolve.

"Well, then, you gotta switch it out of Lizzie, Mister, the way you done out of Sammy. If you give her the good switchin' you give Sammy last week fur not mindin' to me, then I guess I won't have no more trouble with her. Sammy you bet he minds to me now when I speak to him! Well, I guess anyhow then! He jumps when I speak since he got that there good whippin' off of you! And Lizzie she needs it worse'n Sammy yet."

Desert Animals That Scorpions Can't Harm

One of the most fascinating chapters in animal poisons is the subject of natural immunity, the fact that some animals are immune to the poisons of others and remain unhurt if stung or bitten by the poisonous animal, whereas all other sorts of beasts succumb.

A case in point is that of desert animals which are unharmed by a scorpion's sting. The desert fox, the kangaroo rat and other inhabitants of deserts where scorpions abound are in this happy position. Their cousins, living far away from the desert, would at once be seriously injured by a scorpion's sting, whereas the desert breeds remain unhurt. It is to be supposed that in the far distant past, before the desert animals had this complete immunity to scorpion venom, those which were stung and could not resist died, leaving no offspring. Their luckier brothers, who happened to have a hardier constitution, survived and left behind them a resistant race of descendants.—Prof. H. Munro Fox in the Forum.

New York Short of Equestrian Statues

A Gothamite who has been on tour with a number of summer visitors finds New York to be exceedingly short on equestrian statues. Having dwelt for many years in Washington, where the horse plays such a conspicuous part in memorials, he has noted the death of bronze chargers in the home town. Evidently the sculptors who designed the statues that adorn New York's parks and streets were not as horse-minded as their fellows at the capital. Some humorist once remarked that every one who owned a horse had a statue erected to his memory in Washington. The equestrian statues in Manhattan are few and far between. There is one of Washington in Union square, one of General Sherman at Fifth avenue and Fifty-ninth street, and two on Riverside drive. The drive statues commemorate Gen. Franz Sigel and Joan of Arc.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Room for Doubt

Mandy was applying for divorce, and Zeke, alarmed at the prospect of losing his meal ticket, was contesting the suit.

"Isn't it true," Zeke's lawyer asked in cross-examination, "that your husband is a deacon in the church and is generally regarded as a pious man?"

"He's a deacon of de church, sho' 'nuff," admitted the aggrieved wife, "but since he's been 'rested three times already for crap-shootin' an' bootleggin', an' has been ketched repeated while runnin' eroun' wid funny-lookin' yaller girls, Ah, has considduble doubts erbout his piosity."

Eagle Ends Long Flight

The eagle found recently at Kizil Youri, on the southern shores of Asia Minor, after a flight from Riga, has been returned to Riga. The bird bore on one of its legs a ring bearing a notice in Russian saying that it had been released in the Russian city during the Zoological congress six years ago.

SHORT LESSONS IN DAIRYING

A series of 52 articles by Land O' Lakes Creameries and published by the Farmers Cooperative Creamery in the interests of its patrons.

LESSON VI.

OFF-FLAVORED CREAM: There is no finer taste than that of Sweet Cream when the cream is produced under right conditions. For this reason strictly Sweet Cream is now used for making the highest quality of market butter.

Cream may be sweet, but if it has any off flavors it will not make good butter.

Off-flavors may be caused from lack of care in milking or from not thoroughly washing the separator and the milk utensils every time they are used, or from not cooling the cream immediately after separating, or from not keeping the cream where the air is pure.

Next to cleanliness, a cream cooling tank is necessary where the cream may be cooled in cold water immediately after separating and kept cool until it is delivered to the creamery and kept where the air is pure.

Communication

To the Editor:

In your last week's issue of the Holt Weekly News you published a certain communication from Anton Anderson, Arvilla, N. D., in which he has criticized the State Banking Department and the Receivers in Charge, in their methods of handling the assets and affairs of the Holt State Bank which closed in May 1922. I have been asked by certain depositors of the old Holt State Bank, who are today our valued customers, to answer this communication.

As far as the affairs of the Holt State Bank are concerned I am not in a position to make any statement. The State Banking Department has requested that all matters of this kind be forwarded to their office for the proper attention. I therefore, want to make it clear that I am not answering this letter as Receiver of the Holt State Bank, but as a private citizen who is interested in Holt, its people and their future welfare. For the benefit of these parties I will give you the following information which will no doubt throw some light on this FAT salaried job that Mr. Anderson writes about:

From Jan. 1st, 1926 to Jan. 1st, 1927 I collected, and remitted to the State Banking Department, or to those entitled to receive these funds, the sum of $4,052.22. This amount was collected on a lot of compromise settlements, one or two foreclosure sales, and two settlements for which we received principal and interest in full. During this time, the State Banking Department paid me the sum of $25 per month, or a total of $800.00. Out of this amount I was forced to pay for postage, stationery, mileage, expense in attending court hearings and the clerking of two auction sales. I am certain that any fair-minded citizen or perhaps Mr. Anderson himself, will agree that this was not a very FAT salary for the year of 1926. In other words, I firmly believe that if a Receiver in Charge had to depend on such a salary for a living, he would soon be on the way to the poor house.

From Jan. 1st, 1927 to Jan. 10th, 1928, I have collected and remitted for the Holt State Bank the sum of $5,295.11, and have $3,000.00 on hand which will be remitted as soon as certain chattel mortgages can be satisfied. During this time the State Banking Department has NOT paid me or the Marshall County State Bank "one red cent" for these services. Perhaps Mr. Anderson will agree with me that the salary for 1927 was not even as FAT as the salary for 1926.

I have great sympathy for the depositors of the Holt State Bank and for those who have lost their savings thru any other closed bank. Failure of banks is due to irregularities of its officers, to heavy withdrawals, or to inflation of their notes and securities over which they have no control. Nevertheless, I also feel that it is the duty of every depositor of any closed bank to co-operate with the State Banking Department and their receiver in charge in the liquidation of the bank's affairs. Under these conditions, I cannot help but feel that Mr. Anderson would be of real value to the depositors of the Holt State Bank if he would direct his criticisms against those who owe the Holt State Bank large sums of money on worthless notes and securities, rather than against those who are assisting in the liquidation of its affairs.

The above figures that I have listed are facts. They are not fiction, published with the idea of making a lot of noise. If Mr. Anderson still feels that this is such a FAT salaried job, I suggest that he leave his present position and take over this receivership. There is no question in my mind that if he could collect as hard as he can shout there would soon be a dividend for the Holt State Bank.

I wish to thank you for allowing me this space and hope that at some future date I may be able to reciprocate.

Respectfully,
GEO. FRICKER
Holt, Minnesota,
Jan. 10, 1928.

A Trip to the Windy City

On returning to her teaching duties here, Miss Paulsrud said that some time would pass before she would enjoy another vacation like the one just gone by. There is no doubt but what all of us would like to have taken a similar trip. Chicago is one of the outstanding cities in our great county and it is interesting to hear what she has to tell us in the following:

We left Fargo on the Northern Pacific on Friday, December 23, with our tickets stamped for Chicago. On arriving, we got off into one of the largest union depots in the country. Without a guide or someone who knows the way, one who has never visited the metropolis of the Middle West would certainly be lost. We were met at this place by two of my [illegible]rs. Our next ride was on the [illegible]evated". We reached our home and next day began exploring the city.

The size of the hotels, stores, and theaters impresses one most. The Palace Hotel and the Hotel Sherman are good examples. A popular radio broadcasting station is located in the latter. Among the stores Marshall-Field's is attractive because of its many lunch and dinner rooms, each of which has a distinctive name. Of the theaters, the Harris is somewhat different from the rest, and so the type of entertainment it presents. Here I saw Ethel Barrymore.

There is plenty of excitement in Chicago for those who want that, but then again quiet places can be found. We saw Lake Michigan on a stormy day in winter. I can imagine just how beautiful Lincoln and Jackson Parks are in summer, and the beauty of the north shore drive, which winds along Lake Michigan at least halfway up the lake thru the beautiful cities. The people are justified in praising these suburbs.

Recent Marriages

Word was received here recently that Miss Nellie Knutson of Sexsmith, Alberta, Canada, was married to Louie Logan of the same place, on Nov. 3, 1927, and that Christian Knutson of Belloy, Alberta, was united in marriage to Miss Delphine Socquet, also of Belloy, on Dec. 27. Both Nellie and Christian have many acquaintances here, as they lived here with their parents, Mr. and Mrs. G. H. Knutson, for quite a while before they moved to Canada, in the Spring of 1921.

The NEWS joins their many friends in wishing them a happily wedded life.

On Thursday, Dec. 29, 1927, at Thief River Falls, occurred the marital union of Emil Simonson and Carolina Ostlund, both young people of this community. The newlyweds are making their home on a farm near Golden Valley.

Jennie Folden, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. T. B. Folden came home recently from Livingston, Montana for a visit with home folks. Miss Folden is a Salvation Army Captain.

PEPPERMINT OIL DROPS IN PRICE

Dreams of Wealth Are Shattered by Crops.

South Bend, Ind.—Peppermint oil, once so precious that dealers kept it stored in bank vaults, has built and shattered dreams of wealth in shorter time almost than any other farm crop. Two years ago a pound of it brought almost $30, buyers fought to contract all the growers had and muck fields reached a premium in Michigan and Indiana.

As quickly as it rose the price decreased. Current sales hover around $3 for a pound, and producers say it costs $2.50 a pound to grow it. This year's crop is a subject of controversy. Buyers declare supplies are plentiful but growers insist production is inadequate. Whatever even tenor there may be is due to long-term contracts, by which far-sighted growers accepting a sliding scale, insured themselves of better prices than the open market brings.

Observers predict increasing demand for oil. In respective order of importance it is used in dentifrices, confections and chewing gum, and in the retail drug trade. Makers of dental cream declare the world is just beginning to brush its teeth, and candy manufacturers report steadily increasing sales.

Generally the mint supply is less than the demand. There are natural restrictions on production. Growers become discouraged when weeds overrun their crop and contaminate the oil so much that it suffers discounts on the markets. Distilling is a problem. Most growers have their own equipment, although custom stills are operated. Private stills do not pay on less than 20 acres of good mint. However, mint production frequently is considered a subsidiary industry, and as one producer drops out another fills his place. While not always as profitable as truck crops adapted to similar land, mint is perhaps more certain. The enormous price reduction has not cut the acreage seriously.

Michigan and Indiana claim 85 per cent of the total mint acreage, with Oregon, Washington and California ranking next in importance.

Crusader's Ghost Seen in Old English Castle

Portsmouth, England.—A ghost which takes the form of a crusader is said to be haunting Portchester castle, on the shore of the upper reaches of Portsmouth harbor. The castle has recently been taken over by the government, and thousands of pounds are being spent on preserving the ruins.

One Portsmouth woman tells the following story:

"When I visited Portchester castle one day, rain compelled me to seek shelter inside. Reaching the second floor I passed into the south chamber, a gloomy room, when I was amazed to see the figure of a man kneeling on the stairs.

"He was tall, stalwart, and good looking, wearing the dress of a crusader. I was spellbound, too frightened to collect my thoughts, much less to reason on what ought to have been done."

The custodian of the castle was very sympathetic, saying he had heard similar stories before.

Ration Increase Gives Soldiers Fresh Food

Washington.—The army is being fed fresh fish, fowl, vegetables, fruit and milk, instead of the canned varieties of these foods, under the 44 per cent increase in ration cost approved by President Coolidge, Maj. Gen. Frank B. Cheatham, quartermaster general, says in his annual report made public.

"With the ration allowance it will not be necessary to augment subsistence funds by dividends received from post exchanges, and the funds thus released can be used for other purposes to improve the comfort and contentment of the enlisted men," he says.

Before the order increasing the ration became effective it cost 34.8 cents a day a man to feed the army in the 1927 fiscal year, General Cheatham said, a reduction of 1.32 cents compared to the previous 12 months. The new ration is based on an approximate cost of 50 cents a day and was worked up after study of the ration costs of the navy and marine corps.

Finds Ancient Scroll Is Schoolboy's Sums

London.—Little did a young Egyptian, who 4,000 years ago scrawled something on a thin sheet of leather, realize the trouble he was originating.

For more than 50 years he kept the British museum guessing.

The scroll came to the museum in 1875. It was so brittle that it had to be treated with a special solution before it could be unrolled.

Learned men declared it was a scribe's ready reckoner. The Egyptians were always such poor fellows at adding up that they sent their figures in a dial to the local scribe to work out.

But, S. R. Glanville, translator of Egyptian heiroglyphics, has spoilt the old story.

"This," he said, "is a sheet of schoolboy's addition sums. Moreover, one of the sums is wrong."

PA AND MA CAN'T TALK EACH OTHER'S TONGUE

Children Interpret and Family Spats Are Unknown.

Manila.—The man who married a dumb wife is more than a fiction title in the Philippines. It accurately describes a matrimonial situation which seems curiously prevalent in these tropic isles.

Of course the wives in question are not actually dumb. But to all intents and purposes they might as well be. They are dumb by force of circumstances, as it were. For their husband can't speak their language, nor can they speak the tongue of their lords and masters.

Throughout the Far East it is common for white foreigners to marry women of the country in which they settle. Nowhere save in the Philippines, however, does a practically complete lack of verbal contact seem at all prevalent. Perhaps it is the enervating climate, which is not conducive to the mental exertion required in learning a new language. In any case, examples of this strange mating are not hard to find.

Children Speak Three Languages.

In one case the wife is a pure blooded Filipino woman who speaks both Spanish and the Tagalog dialect, but no English. The husband speaks English only. They have two children, who do quite well in all three languages and now serve as family interpreters.

Another odd case was found in the union of a Japanese woman and an American. Neither speaks the other's language, though in Japan such unions ordinarily result in each picking up a smattering of the other's speech at once. The situation seemed so extraordinary that an interpreter was obtained in order to query the wife in detail. Said she:

"You see, my husband works at night and he stays home and sleeps in the daytime. I work during the day and sleep at night. We hardly see each other and don't find it at all inconvenient not to be able to talk. When we want to converse we can always find somebody handy to interpret."

It Has Its Advantages.

Observers of these speechless matings point out that they have certain striking advantages over the ordinary sort. There is no chance for a quarrel, because neither can start it. Intellectual friction isn't likely to develop where there is no exchange of views. Neither can be bored with the other's conversation. Ill feeling is avoided by the absence of temptation to "have the last word," for where there isn't any first word there can't very well be a last one.

On the other hand, the wife has to go out and tell the neighbors when she detects several pesos missing from the weekly pay envelope. There is no chance to settle the matter within the family circle. Also, if the husband feels that the food isn't appearing fast enough or in sufficient quantity, he is handicapped in making his ideas known.

English Rats Eat Food Worth 500 Million

London.—Rats and mice eat $500,000,000 worth of food in the British isles every year, according to Sir Thomas Horder, physician to King George.

In an address to the college of pestology Sir Thomas gave the following explanation as to how the computation was made:

"It is computed that there are as many rats in Great Britain as there are human beings, which is about 44,000,000. Each rat eats 2 cents' worth of food per day or 88,000,000 cents per day, which is equal to around $330,000,000 per anum. A mouse, it is computed, eats 1 cent's worth of food per day. Assuming that there are about the same number of mice as rats, the total of $170,000,000 would be eaten annually by the mice."

Chelsea's "Queen" Rules by Right of Her Ankles

London.—When the iron gates begin to clank in front of the Piccadilly restaurants London's bohemian quarter, Chelsea, begins to light up. Writers, artists, sculptors and all the hangers-on, including quite a few smart young couples from Mayfair, begin to congregate at the studios. Prominent among them is Miss Eileen Hawthorne, artist's model, known as "The Queen of Chelsea."

Miss Hawthorne, who is said to have the most shapely ankles of all the Chelsea models, has posed for nearly ever painter of note in London and is one of the moving spirits of the Chelsea parties.

Here's Highbrow Buddy to Something or Other

Athens, Ga.—A new "college fraternity" has sprung into full flower at the University of Georgia and its requirements for membership bid fair to make it one of the nation's most exclusive.

To qualify among the brethren of Sigma King, as the order is entitled, one must be an Ethiopian of prominent family connections, must be a butler at a recognized Greek letter fraternity house, must never have missed a football game in Athens since becoming a fraternity butler, and must wear only college clothes acquired from college men.

TAKES YARDSTICK INTO CONGRESS

Would Measure Solons as Typical Americans.

Washington.—Measurement of members of the national house and senate is to be attempted during the present term of congress by Dr. Arthur MacDonald, anthropologist, in an effort to determine the physical status of the American people.

Doctor MacDonald, author of scientific books, will try also to arrive at mental and physical proportions of the citizenry of 30 other nations through similar examination of their legislative bodies, which he is endeavoring to arrange with the co-opepation of the State department.

He believes members of congress to represent, both mentally and physically, the American people.

The anthropologist purposes also to compare various groups of congressmen as to legislative ability, predominant lineage, sociological condition and physical status, after which he will calculate the relation between these factors.

He hopes that the work may lead presently to similar classification of legislatures by states, so that there will be established eventually a comparison between the legislatures of different nations and national groups.

He explains why he is selecting lawmaking bodies as the bases for his tests:

"The physical measurements of members of congress represent the anthropological status of the whole country much better than measurements of any other body of men. More important still, these measurements will be a basis for the health of the nation."

171 Potatoes Dug From Hill in West Canada

Saskatoon, Sask.—J. H. Hoover, a farmer living near Battleford, recently established a world's record when he dug a total of 171 potatoes from one hill on his land.

According to Hoover, his phenomenal yield of tubers came from a single parent spud. It took him approximately ten seconds last spring to plant the prize hill and more than 16 minutes to garner the harvest, which filled a bushel basket.

The potato crop all over Saskatchewan has been abundant and has kept pace with the wheat crop in unusual acreage yields. Total yield of potatoes, it is estimated, will reach 4,000,000 hundredweight.

Ordinarily the average yield of potatoes in the province is about 80 hundredweight an acre, but the 1927 crop is expected to run much higher. Total value of the province's potato yield for 1927, it is said, will be well over $4,300,000.

Tourists Have Reason for Joy in Capri Port

Capri, Italy.—Capri is to have its own port at last, and the uncomfortable experience of tourists in landing on the Syren island in tossing and pitching rowboats, which long has proved unpleasant to many passengers, especially women, will come to an end.

Work has already begun on the new harbor, which will extend from the Marina Grande for a sufficient distance to allow the steamers from Naples to land their passengers without risking sea-sickness in a small fishing boat.

The old system of landing here has often proved a real torture to tourists. When the sea is rough it has often proved impossible to land passengers at all, and the Naples packet has had on numerous occasions to anchor off the shore with its suffering humanity until the sea had gone down sufficiently to effect a landing by means of the small boats.

Peter the Great Ate Heartily, Menu Shows

Godalming, Surrey, England.—Just a century ago Peter the Great and his entourage of 13 were guests at a local inn, and here is a detailed description, reproduced from the London Evening Standard, of what they ate.

"Breakfast—Half a sheep, quarter of lamb, 10 pullets, 12 chickens, 3 quarts of brandy, 66 quarts of mulled wine, 84 eggs with salads.

"Dinner—Five ribs of beef, each weighing 3 stone; 1 sheep, 3 quarters of lamb, a shoulder and loin of veal, 8 pullets, 4 couple of rabbits, 2½ dozen of sack and 1 dozen claret."

"Unscrupulous" Man Is Offered Many Jobs

Baltimore, Md. — Describing himself in an advertisement in which he sought work as "thoroughly unscrupulous" and "with no references," George Boppe of Pimlico recently said he received 25 offers within a few hours. "Some," he said, "were from persons who had an occasional piece of dirty work; others from those who wanted a henchman."

Formerly of East Orange, N. J., Boppe said he was a college man and had worked at many trades. "I have no references; I can't get a job," he continued, "so I concluded to seek work that didn't require a reference."

Convicted Man "Beats" Way to Prison Cell

Leavenworth, Kan.—William Burns, convicted in San Francisco, "beat" his way on a freight train from Minneapolis to begin serving his sentence in the federal penitentiary here.

He surrendered to Chief of Police Jack Glynn.

"I got a two-year sentence," he said, "and I'm ready to begin my time."

He said he was convicted with 18 others in Federal court at San Francisco two years ago in connection with labor trouble in lumber camps. He said he boarded a freight train at Minneapolis when he received word from his attorney that his appeal had been dismissed.

Chief Glynn sent him to the penitentiary.

MOTHER OFFERS TO SELL EAR FOR $4,000

Answers Advertisement of Society Woman.

Chicago.—A New York and Chicago society woman advertised for a left ear and she had one applicant willing to give an ear, but the applicant asked $4,000 for it instead of the $2,500 offered.

The newspaper advertisement offered $2,500 through the woman's attorney "for one left ear to be grafted on client" and specified that the operation was to be performed by a competent surgeon and the matter would be kept strictly confidential. Applicants were required to be light skinned, not more than twenty-five years old and to submit photographs.

Jay J. McCarthy said he was attorney for the woman who wants an ear and whom he described as a society woman of New York but formerly of Chicago who lost the member a few years ago in an automobile accident.

The woman, the attorney said, has been forced to wear long hair to cover the deformity and now desires to bob it, "besides," said the attorney, "I understand fashion decrees that ears be shown this season."

Mr. McCarthy said he had received one application to give an ear. The applicant, a married woman and a mother, said she would give her left ear but that the price would be $4,000. McCarthy said his client intended to give as much as $5,000 if the operation were a success.

Boy's Prattle Brings Charge of Murder

Kansas City, Mo.—The talk of a seven-year-old boy among neighbors children resulted in the arraignment of his mother, Mrs. Myrtle Withey, twenty-five, on a charge of first de gree murder, in connection with the death of her husband, William Jewell Withey, October 23, from poisoning.

Mrs. Withey was sent to jail in default of $50,000 bond to await pre liminary hearing. Frank McAlister, motor car salesman, said by police to be a friend of Mrs. Withey, was placed under $1,000 bond as a material witness.

Gossip which followed the confiding to playmates by William Jewell Withey, Jr., that he was to have a "new daddy," led to the discovery of poison in the viscera of Withey and the arrest of Mrs. Withey. The boy told detectives he saw his mother throw a bottle of poison in the furnace at their home the day after his father died.

Mrs. Withey said her husband had died after eating chili and advanced a suicide theory.

Boy Slain by Wolf, Father Closes Zoo

Middletown, N. J.—The Twin Brook Zoo here has been closed and the 300 acres on which it stood offered for sale for building purposes.

A series of escapes of animals brought the zoo into prominence several times within the past two years. A year ago a leopard escaped and was at large for weeks before it was killed. Six months ago several monkeys escaped and created mischief.

The worst blow suffered by Oliver Holton, owner of the zoo, came last summer when a timber wolf eluded keepers and attacked and killed his son, Thomas Holton, three years old.

The tragedy started agitation among residents of the county and the town commission was petitioned to take steps to close the zoo. A committee was appointed but could find no evidence of neglect by the owner or his employees and gradually the agitation died down.

Mailman Injured When Arrow Wrecks Wheel

London.—"I shot an arrow into the air. A postman fell to earth, he knew not where."

These are the first lines of a skit on Longfellow's famous poem now being recited by Harold Deards, an Oxshott (Surrey) boy.

Harold was playing with a toy bow and arrow in a field by the side of a steep hill. The local mailman was bicycling down the hill. The arrow jammed between the spokes of the front wheel and the fork. The postman took a head dive over the handle bar, landing on his face, breaking a finger and cutting his eye.

Nobel Prize Winners of All Nationalities

According to a report of the Nobel foundation its total funds now amount to nearly 31,000,000 crowns, or more than $8,000,000. Beginning in 1901, Nobel prizes amounting to a total of between 13,000,000 and 14,000,000 crowns have been awarded. Of these 23 prizes went to medical men, 23 were awarded in chemistry, 32 in physics, 25 in literature and 28 for the promotion of peace. The recipients of prizes included 3 Germans, 24 Frenchmen, 20 Englishmen, 9 Swedes, 8 Americans, 7 Swiss; Hollanders and Danes, 6 each; Belgians, Norwegians, Italians and Austrians, 4 each; Spaniards, 3; Canadians, Poles and Russians, 2 each; Irish and Bengalese, 1 each. Of the peace prizes 6 went to France, 4 to Switzerland and 4 to America.

Silk From Cornstalks

Silky cloth, strong enough to be fashioned into clothing, is the latest product which the chemist's magic is extracting from those hitherto wasted by-products—cornstalks.

Samples of the fabric were exhibited recently by Dr. O. R. Sweeney, chief chemist of Iowa State college, with paper and lumber substitutes also made from cornstalks. In Popular Science Magazine, Doctor Sweeney describes adhesive, charcoal, solvents, embalming fluids and chemicals as other commodities which cornstalks might produce. He now estimates that a 160-acre field would yield enough stalks to net the farmer a profit of $5,000, provided the farmer controlled the manufacturing.

STORY FROM THE START

Handsome, fastidious and wealthy—young St. Croix Creighton awaits his sweetheart at their trysting place. She is fifteen minutes late, this ordinary little Pennsylvania Dutch girl, Meely Schwenckton, but he awaits her eagerly. She is so demurely beautiful, he thinks, but so out of his "class." Despite her apparent innocence and ignorance, she succeeds in keeping him at a distance, to his chagrin. Meely, in the Schwenckton home, is altogether unlike the girl who meets St. Croix clandestinely, and her speech has little of the Pennsylvania Dutch accent.

The noise of Mr. Schwenckton's suddenly rising and walking to the door at the head of the stairs sent Lizzie, white and quivering, back to her dishwashing.

Meely, slowly following, took a towel and began to dry the dishes already washed, both of them waiting in tense anxiety for the entrance of "the Mister."

But Mr. Schwenckton did not at once come down. Meely and Lizzie, from where they worked, could still hear, faintly, the voices in the room above.

"I have awful afraid!" Lizzie whispered, her teeth chattering as she splashed in the dishpan. "Pop he whips so hard! It's awful good of you, Meely, to help me! Mebby if I have all done nice and clean till Pop comes down, he won't whip me so hard!"

"You poor little thing!" Meely exclaimed, working as fast as Lizzie herself. "I won't let him touch you! I'll—"

"But I have afraid that would make him do it all the harder, Meely—your takin' up for me after what his Susie just tol' him!—how you tol' me it was a pity I wasn't old enough to run off! If you took up for me now, after her tellin' him that, he'd think I was gettin' spoilt by you and that he'd have to learn me!"

"But you've done nothing! That horrible woman lies! I'll tell him how she lies! And how she imposes on you two children and overworks you. He's too fond of you, Lizzie, to allow it, once he understands. He seems so especially fond of you, Lizzie. Did he ever whip you?"

"Not yet. I'm the only one he didn't whip. Each one, as soon as they got big enough, got one awful hard whippin' and then never no more. Oncet was enough. After that one they never disobeyed to Pop no more. Oncet was enough to learn 'em. Except Sammy. On account of Aunt Rosy's bein' here, Sammy's had his second one. The reason Nettie and Jakey run off was that Pop was a-goin' to whip 'em if they didn't mind to Aunt Rosy, and as big-growed as what they are yet, they didn't want to take it off of him, so they run off."

"But how have you escaped, Lizzie?"

"I don't know—I never seemed to do nothin' to get a whippin' for. But I know Aunt Rosy'll make him whip me tonight! I have so afraid, Meely! I'd run off to Gramma's like Nettie done if it wasn't dark night and ten miles away!"

"It's a wonder your father doesn't force Nettie to come home. He did try to, didn't he?"

"Yes, but Gramma she told Pop he darsen't make Nettie come home till Aunt Rosy's away a'ready. Till Susie's well and Aunt Rosy goes, then Nettie she'll come home. But mind you what she tol' Pop yet!"

"What?"

"She tol' Pop if he tried to whip her fur runnin' off, she'd run off where he couldn't find her, like Jakey done. Pop he's awful downhearted about Jakey. He don't show it much; but he is."

It was not until after Sammy had finished his supper and the table was cleared and the last dish washed and put away in the cupboard, that Mr. Schwenckton, followed by Aunt Rosy, returned to the kitchen.

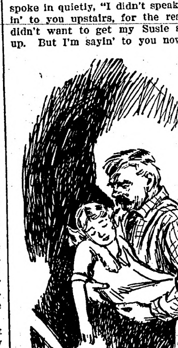
Lizzie, with a faint hope of saving herself, spoke to him ingratiatingly, though she was white with fear of him. "See, Pop, how I got all the work done—all the dishes and pans—"

"Yes, well, but," Aunt Rosy broke in, "look at your diapers still layin—" Mr. Schwenckton laid his arm around Lizzie's thin shoulders, which shrank away from his touch, for she did not know whether it meant a caress or whether he was about to lead her away for punishment.

Meely, fearing the latter (for she had been a witness to Sammy's chastisement a week ago) could not restrain herself, unwise as she felt her interference might be. "Mr. Schwenckton, this woman doesn't tell you the truth!" she said breathlessly. "Lizzie's an obedient, willing, hard-working child!—and if Aunt Rosy can't get on with her, that's her fault and not Lizzie's. And, Mr. Schwenckton, it's a crime to put a little frail girl like Lizzie to such heavy work as washing sheets and diapers! You don't know, do you, that this little girl stands at the washtub several hours every day? Her back will be strained! I ought to have told you before, but I hated to interfere. Now, Mr. Schwenckton, you've got to put a stop to it! You must, you must!—this woman's a devil—"

"Tut, tut!" Mr. Schwenckton raised his hand in protest against such unseemly language on the lips of a girl; and Aunt Rosy's look of deadly spite at Meely's accusation turned into a broad smirk of satisfaction. "Didn't I tell you Sam, how she's gettin' Lizzie spoilt fur you? Learnin' her to swear and curse (you heard her call me a devil yet!) and to disrespec' me and you—"

"Aunt Rosy," Mr. Schwenckton spoke in quietly, "I didn't speak nothin' to you upstairs, for the reason I didn't want to get my Susie stirred up. But I'm sayin' to you now that I pay you to do the work here and you don't do it. You try to put it off on my little childern. And what they don't do don't get done. You drove off my Nettie and Jakey and now you abuse Sammy and Lizzie. If it wasn't that Susie wants you here, I'd get another housekeeper; for no perfeck stranger could do worse'n what you do! So if there's any more trouble and if things ain't kept cleaner 'round here, I will send you packin', now mind I'm tellin' you!"



Then, Very Carefully, So as Not to Waken Her, He Carried Her Upstairs and Put Her to Bed.

Aunt Rosy, with a look of cold, concentrated resentment at Meely, turned to go instantly upstairs to her sister—but Mr. Schwenckton checked her by the simple, but effective means of barring her way with his brawny outstretched arm. "Not up there. I won't have Susie worried no more tonight." He pointed to the door opening from the kitchen into a small bedroom. "To your own room, Aunt Rosy."

She looked at him reproachfully. "So this here's the thanks a body gets for leavin' my own home and comin' here to work myself to the bone for yous—"

"Yes, well, if you did work for us—but you don't. You make my little childern do all. Puttin' a little girl like Lizzie yet to the wash-tub! Yi, yi, yi! Don't you leave me hear of such a thing again!"

"It's her," Aunt Rosy pointed vindictively at Meely, "that makes you so contrary! Takin' your childern's part agin your wife's sister! And standin' by a stranger that's tryin' to keep your wife sick by washin' her and openin' windahs on her—"

"That'll do, that'll do, Aunt Rosy. It didn't need Meely to open my eyes—though for a while, there, I was awful dumb about you. But I only gotta take a look at this here crusty, through-other kitchen—and your puttin' Lizzie at the wash-tub, a child like that!—well, le' me tell you that when I come in here this evenin' and seen Lizzie at that there tub standin', I felt dangerous! I didn't show it none, but for a minute there I felt dangerous! So," he concluded, "don't leave it happen again. And don't go near Susie no more tonight."

For an instant Aunt Rosy wavered, as though weighing the possibility of defying her brother-in-law. But she knew the futility of such an attempt. He'd simply pack her in his car and run her back to her own home; that's how he'd settle it.

So, with a parting glance of malice at Meely, she turned away and went to her bedroom.

Mr. Schwenckton stooped and, picking Lizzie up in his arms as though she were a baby, carried her across the room to a big rocking-chair, where, folded to his breast, he rocked her until she fell asleep.

Then, very carefully so as not to waken her, he carried her upstairs and put her to bed.

CHAPTER III

It was at the heavy noon meal of the next day that Meely for the first time heard Mr. Schwenckton break his own rule against complaining at the table. "Ach, Aunt Rosy, these here flies is somepin awful! Susie she never has no flies when she housekeeps. And this here's October yet! My first wife, neither, she didn't have no flies. Leastways not in October yet! Why do you so leave the flies in? Couldn't you manage with less flies?"

"It ain't my fault that there's flies. It's that there fat farm-hand of yourn that gives flies in fur me, still; fur when he goes out the door, he's so fat he can't get out quick and that lets the flies in."

"You're always got a good excuse, aint, Aunt Rosy?"

"But I don't see, Mister, why you ever got such a fat farm-hand that he gives flies in fur me and that he's too fat to set in your car and drive it for you." She diverted the conversation from flies.

"Yes, it is some onhandy that me and Absalom's both too big to drive our car easy. Us," smiled the farmer, who liked his little joke, "we gotta set in the back seat and have such a chiffonneer! But, Aunt Rosy, blamin' Absalom for these here flies—no. That's goin' too far. I don't give you right. You better get after these here flies—"

"Did Absalom tell you," Aunt Rosy diplomatically interrupted, "who his comp'ny is that's wisitin' at their place?"

This question proved effective in diverting attention from the flies.

"Why, no, he didn't speak nothin' to me that they had comp'ny wisitin' 'em," said Mr. Schwenckton. "What makes you conceit that?—that they have comp'ny?"

"I seen a strange shirt on their wash-line this morning that I reckonized wasn't Absalom's. I didn't get time to run down and ast Missus whose the strange shirt was—what with all I had to do and Lizzie not helpin' any," she whined in a tone of deep injury. "But this after, mebby, I'll get time to run down."

"That's funny, too, again—that they got a strange shirt hangin' out and Absalom not sayin' nothin' to me about comp'ny," remarked Mr. Schwenckton reflectively.

"But couldn't the 'strange shirt' be a new one of Absalom's?" Meely asked.

"No, it ain't Absalom's size or color," Aunt Rosy pointed out.

"Do you know," said Mr. Schwenckton thoughtfully, "what I suspicion about that there strange shirt? I suspicion they're got a boarder at Absalom's, like us. I guess Marvin Creighton's boardin' with 'em since his Pop turned him out! For, you see, this here township's very handy in the center of all the schools he has to wisit. Yes, I bet you that's whose the strange shirt is! It's Marvin Creighton's! So then, Meely," he jocularly added, "you better watch your step, with the school superintendent livin' right handy here in sight of us! On our own farm yet!"

Meely stared blankly for a moment, without comment; then, pulling herself together, dropped her eyes to her plate.

As Meely remained silent, Aunt Rosy prodded her for an expression of her sensations at the great news.

"I suppose," Meely at last became articulate, "my teaching, when he beholds it, will give him a shock! It's not," she sighed, "according to rule. I don't know the rules! I don't know anything about teaching! I do have some ideas of my own, though—"

The sudden realization that she was talking to one of the school trustees brought her to with a jolt.

When to Smile

As long as things go well with some folks, they are chipper as a basket of chips; but the minute they feel a pin prick of hard luck, their faces are as long as a hammer handle. Men with the real stuff in them smile the biggest when the tug at their hearts is hardest

Red Blood Cells in Human Being Vital

Ever since the red blood cells were first seen in the circulating blood more than 100 years ago, scientists have been endeavoring to determine such facts as the amount of blood flowing in the veins and in the arteries of the average person, and the number of red blood cells. Indeed, accurate measurements of temperature, pulse rate, breathing rate and other measurable factors are of the greatest importance in measuring the extent or nature of disease. Obviously all of these determinations are subject to human error associated with the one who makes the observations and with defects of apparatus that is used for making of the important measurements.

The number of red blood cells is important particularly in relationship to such diseases as pernicious and secondary anemias. When the number is considerably below 4,500,000 per cubic millimeter, the person is likely to breathe with difficulty and have little vitality or resistance to disease. In a figure as large as 5,000,000, a variation of 10,000 does not make a considerable difference. However, larger variations are of importance.—Dr. Morris Fishbein, in the Scientific American.

JOHN SPEAKS FOR HIMSELF

(© by D. J. Walsh.)

"MAY I present my son, John Alden Woodward, Miss Trevor? John Alden, this is Constance Trevor of whom I have told you. I am sure you are going to be very good friends."

The elegant Mrs. Woodward smiled complacently upon the young couple before her. Her son, tall and handsome in white flannels; the girl boyishly slender in her riding habit, the little tri-cornered hat fitting snugly over her tawny hair.

Constance Trevor extended her hand. "John Alden Woodward," she repeated and then added mischievously, "Any kin to the John Alden who stole the love of Priscilla away from dear old Miles Standish?"

John Alden Woodward scowled darkly.

"Indeed he is," said Mrs. Woodward hastily and a little proudly. "He is named for the very same John Alden. My ancestors came over in the Mayflower. . . ."

A group of young people came down the veranda and carried Constance off for the afternoon ride. John Alden dropped into a chair facing his mother.

"For the love of Mike, can't you forget that Mayflower stuff, mother? I've been fed on it—brought up on it and I tell you, I'm sick of it! Ever since you came down to school in my freshman year and spilled the beans about your illustrious relatives, the follows have panned me right. Forget it! What good is it anyway?"

"I should think you would be glad to claim such ancestors, my son. Surely a young man with your education must realize what it means to have forbears such as yours. I would like to blazon the fact from the housetops that my courageous forefathers sailed across the ocean in the search of freedom of worship—I am disappointed, John Alden." Then she changed the subject. "Isn't Constance charming?"

"Didn't notice her—much," he replied, moodily. "I might have if you hadn't made that crack about my name. John Alden was all right—so was all the rest of the crowd maybe, but they lived their lives—let me live mine. Is she going to stay here with her uncle all summer?"

Their genial host, Judge Benjamin Cardiff, joined them. He was giving this house party over the week-end in honor of his niece who had come from the South to spend the summer with him.

"Well, John Alden, all through with the rah-rah stuff and ready to enter the scrap with the world, eh? Law isn't a bad game, either, and I'm qualified to speak after thirty-nine years of it. Hear you are going in with Carter Drummond. You are fortunate. Carter has established a remarkable practice and it is a splendid opportunity for you. He is coming down on the 4:32. Connie asked him when we met him in town yesterday. It will be a pleasure to entertain the partners of the new law firm of Drummond & Woodward."

"If you have not already sent your car I would like to run down to the station and meet him, judge," said John Alden. "Haven't a thing to do. Got here too late to get in on the ride."

Halfway to the station he met the riders returning home. Connie and Billy Harwood were in the lead and she waved her riding crop to him. By Jove, she was attractive—his mother had written about her. Mother was ambitious all right, rather raw the way he had jumped on her about the ancestor stuff, but a fellow gets tired of that bunk—Constance Trevor—darn pretty name—pretty girl, too—how the deuce had old Carter Drummond, handsome, debonair, man-about-town—not a day under forty—the old fossil, ever got in so strong with her—darn nice-looking girl—rolled her r's—

The next time he saw her she was in a daffodil-yellow frock and Carter Drummond, his law partner, was leaning over her. She was laughing up at him. John Alden turned away and tried to be pleasant to little Poppy Langhorne. Then Judge Cardiff touched him on the arm.

"Would it be agreeable for you to take Connie in to dinner, John A.?"

Unfortunately Carter Drummond was at her left and monopolized her unpardonably until John Alden made a desperate resolve.

"I say, Miss Trevor, don't you think you might show me a little attention? Let old Carter there talk to his partner—you talk to me."

Constance Trevor turned to him, laughing.

"Well, you do inherit some of the courage of your Puritan ancestors after all, John Alden. I just thought I didn't exist—for you. You haven't said a nice thing to me since you met me, as Mr. Drummond does."

"Bunk! I mean that ancestor stuff. Forget it! I'm not for it, honest! And you look just like a daffodil in the springtime. How many dances do I get?"

"We-ll," she drawled, "I think we can manage three—and, of course, there will be some cut-ins. And—honest—I promise—never, never, never to mention the breaking waves and the rock-bound coast and the dear old Miles Standish to you again, unless—for some very good reason."

John Alden Woodward was a frequent guest at Judge Cardiff's home that summer. He danced, swam, rode, motored and golfed with Connie Trevor, but it always seemed that his partner managed to make a threesome of whatever they planned, and Connie generously divided her time between them. Then on a Saturday morning in the fall Drummond came into John's office.

"Will you do me a good turn, old man? I am going to be tied up with the Widow Morganthau all afternoon and have asked Connie for dinner and the theater. I won't have time to go over and get her and was wondering if you wouldn't do it for me. Connie will surely understand. Thanks, old man. By the way, you might plan on being best man in a few months."

John Alden looked up at his partner. "What?"

"Best man—best m-a-n. I'm deucedly tired of living around at the clubs, and all that. Want a home. Never thought much about getting married until I met Connie."

John Alden sat slumped down behind the wheel of his car, hardly noticing the gorgeous autumnal landscape as he drove to Judge Cardiff's home. What an ass he had been, to be sure—thought all the time that Connie had liked him—had been butting in on her and Carter. Jove, that was a blow—Carter and Connie—his partner and the girl he loved.

Constance was curled up in her uncle's favorite chair before the fireplace reading. John threw off his overcoat and stood gazing at her.

"Oh," she drawled, "I thought it was Carter. Where do you suppose he is?"

"In the city," snapped John Alden. "I am his emissary, sent to take you to the city, that he may dine with you, make love to you, propose to you. I apologize for being such a fool this summer, Miss Trevor. I—I didn't know that I was—a third party."

Constance unwound herself and brought both heels down to the floor with a resounding whack. "Oh-h-h!" she said slowly. "How very interesting. So Carter sent you for me, that he might dine with me, make love to me? Are you very sure that he didn't ask you to propose for him, John?"

"Fortunately—not."

Constance stood up and took both lapels of his coat in her hands. John looked straight over the top of her red-gold hair at the mantel, over which a huge painting of Judge Benjamin Cardiff smiled benignly down upon them.

"Jack," she said softly, "do you remember the story of the courtship of Miles Standish?"

"Lord, yes! What of it?"

"Then—then—why don't you speak for yourself, John Alden?" she whispered and a second later her face was buried close against his tweed shoulder. "I—I take it back," she laughed. "I didn't mean to call you that. I meant—why don't you ask me to marry you, John, I'm ready. Are you?"

Attics Always Close to Heart of Child

The attic is perhaps the most fascinating room of all. Here is found the answer as to why these little houses of New England have endured. Every one of the great timbers is hand hewn and put together with hand-made wooden pegs—construction such as this defies time and the elements. Before one window is a fine old pine table; there is another Boston rocker; quaint little footstools and a sea chest which has been in the house since one of the first sea captains waved good-by to his family, standing beside the lilacs in the dooryard, and set out, his sea chest going with him, for trade and adventure upon the seven seas.

Still above this old attic clings the faint aroma of apples and herbs which once were hung there to dry. And it holds countless memories of children who have played here on rainy days or on cold days of the New England winter when the drifts were piled high over the picket fence and the surrounding country lay buried beneath a blanket of snow. One can imagine the first children playing at being pilgrims and a later generation at being Indians, after the reality of Indians had lost its terror. But whatever the games they played, they were sure to seek the mysterious attic where there were trunks to rummage in, dusky corners to explore and apples to eat.—Arts and Decorations.

Medical Advice

"Hey, Doc!" called Gap Jonnson of Rumpus Ridge, addressing Doctor Slash, who was rushing past in his car. "My boy, Banty, has got something the matter with him. He is aching all the time, and can't stand, set or lay down. I wished you'd stop and sorter look at him!"

"Can't now, Gap!" responded the physician. "I'm sent for to see a gent that has been shot all to pieces by his brother-in-law. Tell Banty to climb a tree and hang on till I come back. Hi-on, Flivver!"—Kansas City Times.

Noise

There is a class of men that gets along fairly well for years by making an impression upon the impressionable, whose sole stock in trade is noise. They do not last forever, but some of them last an astonishingly long time. Like toy balloons, these wind-inflated beings make a gaudy appearance for a while, but in time collapse. When the balloon comes down, a child somewhere is made unhappy, but when the public career of an inflated man ends suddenly nobody but himself is even aware of it.—Muncie Evening Post

Drink Water to Help Wash Out Kidney Poison

If Your Back Hurts or Bladder Bothers You, Begin Taking Salts

When your kidneys hurt and your back feels sore don't get scared and proceed to load your stomach with a lot of drugs that excite the kidneys and irritate the entire urinary tract. Keep your kidneys clean like you keep your bowels clean, by flushing them with a mild, harmless salts which helps to remove the body's urinous waste and stimulates them to their normal activity. The function of the kidneys is to filter the blood. In 24 hours they strain from it 500 grains of acid and waste, so we can readily understand the vital importance of keeping the kidneys active.

Drink lots of good water—you can't drink too much; also get from any pharmacist about four ounces of Jad Salts; take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast each morning for a few days and your kidneys may then act fine. This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to help clean and stimulate clogged kidneys; also to neutralize the acids in the system so they are no longer a source of irritation, thus often relieving bladder weakness.

Jad Salts is inexpensive, cannot injure; makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink, which everyone should take now and then to help keep their kidneys clean and active. Try this; also keep up the water drinking, and no doubt you will wonder what became of your kidney trouble and backache.

SHORT LESSONS IN DAIRYING

A series of 52 articles by Land O' Lakes Creameries and published by the Farmers Cooperative Creamery in the interests of its patrons.

LESSON VII.

Cream Cooling Tank: Creameries that have the most cream cooling tanks in use among the patrons receive the most Sweet Cream for making a high quality butter.

A cream cooling tank may be bought for $10 to $12 or be home-made out of cement, or it may be made out of a barrel for a small herd. It should be large enough to hold at least one large and one small can, as the fresh cream should always be kept separate until it is thoroughly cooled.

The cream cooling tank is set near the well and the water pumped directly into it and then piped on to the stock tank so that all the water flows thru the cooler. A small house should be built over it to keep out the heat in summer and cold in winter. Cream shoud be kept in cold water in winter as well as summer, so it will cool quickly and keep from freezing.

The Honor Roll

The following names are those of patrons who delivered 100 lbs. or more of butterfat to the local creamery during the month of October, 1927.

Name	Lbs.
Arno Steinhauer	390
C. A. Davis	305
F. D. Voth	284
J. P. Augustine	268
Chr. Engen	248
Mrs. J. D. Holst	187
J. P. Benitt	182
C. F. Lindholm	178
Wm. Mehrkens	174
J. O. Johnson	148
W. F. McMurray	147
S. H. Nohre	143
Theo. Dovre	143
Axel Ring	132
E. O. Waagedahl	131
A. L. Sagstuen	131
Ralph Ness	127
Aug. Hoffman	125
Iver Borsheim	108
M. J. Lunke	101

Arno Steinhauer and C. A. Davis hold the same position as last month, but F. D. Voth and J. P. Augustine took 3d and 4th places away from Chr. Engen and Oscar Erickson, nevertheless Mr. Engen holds 5th place by a big margin.

At this writing we have a few patrons who have never patronized us for some time. We welcome them among our patronage and hope that the results of their cream sales will be such that they will find out they can do no better anywhere else, nor as well, which should mean that they would see whereby it would pay them to continue delivering their cream to this creamery. If these patrons were living outside of our territory, no efforts would be made to encourage them to come here, but, inasmuch as they rightly belong in our territory, to invite them here is but sound business tactics.

There are several reasons why this creamery has made a success. The paramount reason is that our patrons are loyal is their support. In plugging for it they have helped build up this creamery, the business of which has grown in both quality and quantity. The patrons have profited by it: butterfat prices have been among the highest paid by other creameries in this section.

I predict that this creamery's growth will continue. Why?

First, Because dairying is the main source of income in this section, and can be developed into a much greater business than it is now.

Second, Because the people in our village and community are very friendly and all boosting for dairying and our local creamery.

We have a Community Spirit in Holt and vicinity that is worth more than dollars and cents. I know many towns and cities that would give almost anything to be able to create such a spirit in their commnnity.

These two facts—Dairying and a Community Spirit—cannot help but bring results. Let us hope that the mutual good feeling between the town and the country will continue to grow.

It is so necessary to have this feeling to make the most of any business or organization.

In closing, let me say: Don't be afraid to tell the world that you sell your cream to the Holt creamery, as we well support the other business places in Holt. One thing you should remember and that is to stick up for your own creamery when you hear someone else is trying to run it down. Most farmers are too timid about saying anything to offset the chronic kicker's statements. Carry your monthly statement in your pocket and show it to the next kicker you meet. If he can read it, and understand it, the statement speaks for itself.

Two File For Senator Job

J. A. Burnquist, former governer of Minnesota, filed Saturday as a candidate for nomination at the June primaries for the United States senate on the Republican ticket. He is the first to file for this office.

Mr. Burnquist was governor of the state during the world war period.

Arthur E. Nelson, former mayor of St. Paul has also filed as a candidate for the republican nomination to the United States senate. He is an attorney in St. Paul.

Christenson Files For Re-Election

On Monday of this week Governor Theodore Christianson filed as a candidate for the Republican gubernatorial nomination, setting at rest persistent reports that he would become a candidate for the United States senate against Hendrik Shipstead, farmer-labor incumbent.

RAIL CONSOLIDATION VIEWED AS URGENT

Economic Authority Asserts Transportation Chief Problem of West.

The outstanding economic problem of the Northwest is the cost of transportation in the opinion of Wayne E. Butterbaugh, transportation authority and lecturer in the school of business of the University of Minnesota.

"Neither the shippers nor the carriers of the Northwest have been making money compared with shippers and carriers in other sections of the country," Mr. Butterbaugh said in a recent address.

Mr. Butterbaugh advances two solutions for this situation: First—to increase the volume of railway traffic; second—to decrease the cost of railroad operation.

These would have the effect, Mr. Butterbaugh said, of increasing the earnings of the railways and in turn enabling them to reduce their rates.

Congress and the Interstate Commerce Commission, he said, could take steps which would increase the volume of traffic moved by the Northwest railways. He proposes: (1) That the Commission should grant the railways permission to reduce rates on transcontinental traffic sufficiently to divert some of the water traffic back to the railways; (2) that Congress should increase the experimental tolls now in effect on traffic through the Panama canal, and (3) should bring highway and waterway traffic under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The railways are being unfairly discriminated against, and this is reacting to the disadvantage and detriment of the Northwest, Mr. Butterbaugh believes.

Transportation costs can be decreased by permitting voluntary consolidation. He has no fears about restricting competition.

"Under present strong government regulation competition is not at all necessary," he said. "On the other hand it is out-and-out waste.

"The interests of shippers, carriers, and regulatory bodies should be to eliminate waste in transportation whenever there is a possibility of doing so, and consolidations offer such opportunities. Voluntary mergers will enable the lines to earn the fair returns set by Congress upon their property valuation as determined by the Commission.

"Tranportation presents us with our one big economic problem in this section of the country. The leading industry of the nation, and of the Northwest is, of course, agriculture. It is, therefore, not strange that these two industrial giants are closely related—that the success of one is, from necessity, tied with the success of the other. When one is depressed the other is depressed; and when one prospers the other is bound to prosper.

"For this reason the managers of our transportation facilities, on the one hand, and shippers engaged in agriculture, in mining, in manufacturing and in commerce, on the other, should work together and not at cross purposes. Their interests are not divergent.

"No other region in the United States is so remote—so isolated—so distant from the high-seas. No other region so resembles the frontier, as does the one immediately to the west, with one-twentieth of the population occupying one-tenth of the national area. No other region is so dependent upon far-distant oceans for the final marketing of its products. No other region is so much a one-industry region.

"No other section of the country has so small a home market, and must ship so large a portion of its products so far in order to reach the ultimate consumer. No other region produces so large a volume of products of a cheap, bulky nature, and hence demanding a low transportation charge. No other region produces commodities having a transportation cost at destination by so large a share of their total value.

"No other region is so dependent upon its railroads. No other region of the United States has so unremunerative railroads, and so impoverished shippers.

"The cry is for cheap transportation. It is in connection with the charges made for railroad service that the real problems of the Northwest are concerned.

"Briefly stated, the shippers claim that rates are too high and should be reduced; and the carriers claim that rates are already too low, and earnings are not sufficient. In truth, both parties are right. Hence, neither can afford to make any further sacrifices for the other. Neither can look for relief from the other. Something must be done for the benefit of both.

"What is needed is increased traffic and lower operating costs. These are two matters that both the carriers and the public should constantly strive for."

Origin of "Tennessee"

The word "Tennessee" is said to be a corruption of an Indian word which is usually written "tenasse," which means "river of the big bend," according to some authorities, and "a curved spoon," according to others. The name "Tennessee" was applied to the region while it was still a part of North Carolina.—Pathfinder Magazine.

Annual Stockholders Meeting

The Annual Stockholders' Meeting of the Marshall County State Bank was held on Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 12, at which time the following were re-elected directors for the coming year: J. W. Black, Louis Wegge, P. L. Anderson, F. D. Voth, and Robert J. Lund.

The bank statement shows the bank to be in excellent condition, with deposits of over $126,000.00. Besides the steady growth in deposits, the bank was able to pay a 6 per cent. dividend on its Capital stock, and also placed a nice sum on its Undivided Profit Account as an additional protection for its depositors. This is a remarkable showing when one considers the large number of bank failures which have occurred during the past two years. The stockholders wish to thank the people of this community for their co-operation during the past year and hope that the bank may continue to be favored with their patronage in the future.

The newly elected directors held their Annual Meeting on the same day and elected the following officers:

J. W. Black, President
Louis Wegge, Vice-President
Geo. Fricker, Cashier
Dorothy Fuller, Assistant Cashier

STORY FROM THE START

Handsome, fastidious and wealthy—young St. Croix Creighton awaits his sweetheart at their trysting place. She is late, this ordinary little Pennsylvania Dutch girl, Meely Schwenckton, but he awaits her eagerly. She is so demurely beautiful, he thinks, but so out of his "class." Despite her seeming innocence and ignorance, she succeeds in keeping him at a distance, to his chagrin. Meely, in the Schwenckton home, where she is boarding, is altogether unlike the girl who meets St. Croix clandestinely. She is the teacher in the neighborhood school, of which Marvin Creighton, St. Croix' brother, is superintendent. Due to family differences, Marvin Creighton boards in town, near Meely. Meely learns that Marvin was to have married his cousin, a titled English lady, but, believing she was attracted by the Creighton wealth, had refused the alliance. It is the rumor that St. Croix is to take Marvin's place and marry the English girl.

"But," said Mr. Schwenckton, puzzled, "you must know how to schoolteach when you're a grad-yate of Kutztown Normal yet! Well, I guess anyhow! Us we don't elec' no teacher to our William Penn that ain't got her Normal school diarploma."

"Oh, yes—well, but—yes, of course," Meely concluded in some confusion. She glanced surreptitiously at Aunt Rosy—and found, to her discomfort, that she was being regarded with a look of cunning suspicion.

"Say!" suddenly spoke up Rosy. "Have you got such a Kutztown Normal school diarploma?"

"Why—why, of course—why, of course I have."

"Mister," she demanded of her brother-in-law, "did you ever see her diarploma?"

"Ach, Rosy, what's over you? To be sure, she had to send her diarploma along with her application and her photygraft when she wrote for the job here at our William Penn. Your photygraft," he said to Meely, "don't favor you much. You're a lot prettier than that there photygraft."

"It's funny," answered Meely, "how my photographs never look like—never do me justice," she amended her remark.

Again she found Aunt Rosy's little cunning eyes boring like gimlets into hers.

* * * * * * *

Meely Schwenckton seemed to herself, these days, to be ever walking in fear. Yet never in all her young life had she found existence so exhilarating, so tense with interesting suspense. It was not really fear, she decided, only a thrilling apprehension that hung over her every minute of the day and night; an apprehension which even if realized could not really bring harm to her, only awkward embarrassment.

"But somebody else would feel more awkward and embarrassed!" she smiled to herself.

However, this apprehension, following her ceaselessly, was a bit nerve-racking; and the startling knowledge just acquired that Marvin Creighton (her "Steady Date's" brother!) stood over her as the school superintendent and was therefore bound to make her acquaintance very soon, greatly augmented her sense of the danger of her situation—a situation brought about less by her own plotting than by a succession of fortuitous and unforeseen circumstances. Never would she have had either the audacity or the ingenuity to have arranged such an extraordinary chain of circumstances.

"Up to now, I've always held fiction to be stranger than truth—but never again! If I were a novelist I'd never have the cheek to make up such a lurid and improbable yarn as I'm living!" she amazedly told herself. "If I offered it to the movies I'm sure they'd consider it too true to life to be convincing."

If either of the Creighton brothers should ever see her in the other's company! Or if St. Croix discovered she was the district teacher, instead of the ignorant cow she feigned to be! Or if any of the Schwenckton family discovered her meeting with St. Croix or any of the other things about her which they were congenitally incapable of suspecting!

It was just three days after her last rendezvous with St. Croix that one afternoon at a quarter past four, school having been dismissed and her plain tailored school dress having been changed right here in her empty schoolroom for the fancy, cheap finery in which she always disguised herself to meet her "Date," that she came out of the schoolhouse and after locking the door and hiding the key under a stone, glanced cautiously up and down the road before starting for the distant hilltop where St. Croix would be waiting for her. For she intended again today to keep him waiting.

Last Monday she really had been at their meeting place long ahead of the appointed time and, having been curious as to how he would treat her tardiness, she had, on his appearing in the distance, hidden in a clump of bushes and watched him; his restless impatience, the eager light in his eyes when once he thought he heard her coming; and then his childish maneuvers to deceive her—his descending the hill, skirting the base and climbing up again on the other side in all that mud! How she had enjoyed herself watching him!

Evidently Marvin was not such an ass as St. Croix. "From all accounts he sounds like the Noble Army-of-Martyrs-Praise-Thee! Which is worse, I wonder—to be a bounder or to be so uncomfortably noble?" It certainly did sound uncomfortably noble to be willing to live at Absalom Puntz' when you could live in the much more comfortable home of the Creightons.

For Aunt Rosy's investigations had proven Mr. Schwenckton's surmise correct—Marvin Creighton was boarding, for the time being, at Absalom's cottage on the Schwenckton's farm, which fact added considerably to Meely's uneasy apprehensions.

As she strolled on her way to her meeting with St. Croix, in the lovely October sunlight, she wondered whether she should amuse herself with "luring" Marvin as she was "working" St. Croix (for other reasons than her amusement). Marvin might not be such easy game; they said he despised girls—

"Probably he's afraid of them! Or he doesn't know any nice ones of the Noble-Army-of-Martyrs style. Could I work the noble stunt, I wonder? Risky! Might get my two roles mixed up! Better keep off Marvin!"

It was just as she came to this conclusion that suddenly, with a jump of her heart, she saw him emerge from a lane on the road ahead of her and, turning in her direction, come straight toward her on the highway in a long swinging stride. She recognized him by that stride, for she had seen him that morning going across the Schwenkton's orchard to Absalom's cottage. That strong, free gait of his would have arrested attention anywhere. How different from St. Croix' dapple prancing.

Suddenly she realized that she dared not let him recognize her in this ridiculously festive frock she was wearing, for as he was bound to meet her soon in her school room dressed in her own character, the contrast would make him suspicious. But how to elude him? The highway offered no escape. She wore no hat that she could pull down over her face. And he was almost up with her!

In desperation, as they were about to pass, she raised both her arms to fuss at her hair and thus conceal her face.

But through the crook of her left arm she saw that she might have spared herself the trouble, for he never so much as glanced at her; apparently so engrossed in his own thoughts that he remained quite unaware of the passing of a pretty girl!

"Well!" she breathed in mingled surprise and pique, for she was used to young men's looking at her as they passed. "Never batted an eyelash at me!"

She had caught a glimpse of his face and the rest of her walk to the hilltop seemed all too short for the interesting reflections aroused thereby. For she had perceived the remarkable fact that Marvin and St. Croix Creighton looked extremely alike, yet totally unlike; alike in feature and coloring and unlike in countenance. St. Croix' smugness was here replaced by a rather wistful melancholy; St. Croix' cynicism by an expression of grave kindliness; St. Croix' scornful pride by a look of genial humor; St. Croix' keenness by a reflective, inquiring expression touched by bewilderment. Of course, all this was not revealed in a passing glimpse. But a great deal of it unfolded to her consciousness as, while she walked, she continued to gaze on the mental image she had caught, of a face so arresting as to make that of his brother, whom she was going to meet, seem by comparison insignificant.

So absorbed had she been, as she loitered along, that she forgot all about St. Croix' annoyance if he were kept waiting for her. So that, when turning a curve in the path up the hill, she suddenly saw him standing there above her, looking coldly offended at her tardiness, it brought her up with a sharp start. The expression of his face made her feel more like turning tail and going back than going on to the top.

"Just imagine," she thought as she toiled up the rest of the slope, "being married to such a disposition!—to a man who'd take it out of you so whenever things didn't suit him exactly!"

She smiled inwardly as she thought that if she were a girl whom he wanted to marry, he would surely never so reveal himself to her.

"He'd surely have the sense to hide, not flaunt, his selfishness and egotism and show me a better side of himself; for of course he must have a better side." Probably with his own class of people, his own family, he was quite different; she had surmised from things he had unconsciously betrayed that he adored his mother and would die before he would hurt her; that he greatly honored his father; and that though he almost hated his elder brother, he respected him.

"So you're actually here, are you?" he ironically greeted her as she stood before him, looking like Magdalene, the Penitent.

"Oh, but, Mr. Creighton," she pleaded, "my stepmom's so bad, she can't set and she can't lay! This here wasn't no gay-low day for me, now mind I'm tellin' you, with Susie so poorly and all! I near broke my neck gettin' here!"

"I suppose you mean gala day? Don't, my child, use words you're not sure of. Well," he added, grinning appreciatively, "if Susie can't even cackle, maybe she'll soon be croaking."

She did not laugh this time, but gazed at him blankly. "And I was up so late last night," she continued her excuses, "that I was near too tired to come this here three miles this atter."

"You poor child! You mean you were sitting up with your sick stepmother?"

"No. Widower Holzapple he's settin' up with me Thursdays."

"What? Holzapple? Who's he?"

"Ach, such a old man, as old as Pop yet, with three full-growed childern. Pop's awful pleased, for Hi Holzapple he's well fixed and owns his own place clear. But, you see," said Meely in an injured tone, her eyes anxious, "he never says straight out he wants to marry me, he just insinyates that way. He'll set for an hour without passin' a remark—just set—and me tryin' to keep awake. And then all of a suddint he'll shoot off a remark—'My childern says, now Pop'll never be lonesome no more.' Or he'll hitch his chair closer to me and say, 'My childern are pleased.' Or if he sees my head noddin', I'm that sleepy, he'll wake me with the remark, 'Charlie will give us a weddin' dinner over at his place.' But, you see, Mr. Creighton," she complained, "it never leads up to nothin'! He never gets furder'n insin-yations. He never yet held my hand oncet nor even tol' me my eyes were pretty."

"But how could you marry an old man with grown children?" asked St. Croix disgustedly, taking his usual seat on the broad, flat stone and motioning her to hers a few feet away.

"Look here, you're not seriously thinking of marrying that old man—what's his name? Holzapple? Are you?" he demanded.

"I gotta marry somebody. What difference is it?—seein' I can't marry the one I like!" she mourned.

He hastened to divert her from this dangerous snag. "Come here to me."

She obeyed him eagerly.

"See what I've brought you." He produced two packages from behind the stone.

With childish acquisitiveness and a touch of Pennsylvania Dutch acquisitiveness, she opened the box of a dozen ornate handkerchiefs (so ornate she had to check a laugh at sight of them; he had evidently judged her taste from her blue voile frock trimmed with artificial flowers; she would keep one for a souvenir and give the rest to Lizzie—how Lizzie would adore them!). But her pleasure in his other offering, a five-pound box of candied fruits, was not assumed.

Napoleon and Lincoln Among the Henpecked

The henpecked man can scarcely be classed as a product of modern times. Historians relate that many of the world's most famous men, including Napoleon, Lincoln and Socrates, were henpecked. One of the letters written by Napoleon to his wife, Josephine, ends with the postscript:

"A thousand kisses—as burning as yours are frosty."

Lincoln, it is said, was henpecked because he was too shy. Count Montgeles, the German biographer of Lincoln, declares that Lincoln's wife loved him superficially, her own selfish ambitions predominating, adding that she constantly pecked at him and almost drove him mad.

The duke of Marlborough, one of Winston Churchill's ancestors, and acclaimed as one of the greatest warriors of his day, was madly in love with his wife, who, however, nagged him all the time. In 1704 he wrote to his wife on the eve of a battle:

"I'm not nearly as much afraid of my 60,000 foes as I am of you when you are mad at me." Next day, with Prince Eugene of Savoy, he won a big victory over the forces of Louis XIV of France.—New York Evening World.

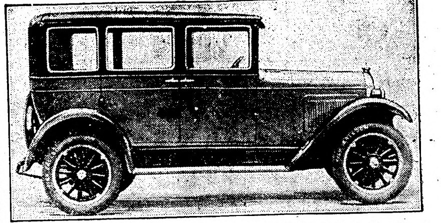
New Whippet Car a Motor Marvel



One of the sensations in the automobile world is the perfected "Whippet" produced by the Willys-Overland, Inc., and it is direct evidence that John N. Willys, president of the corporation, proposes to make good on his declaration that "there can be no monopoly in the light car field." The perfected car, and the price at which it is offered, placing it directly in competition with the lowest priced cars, has centered the eyes of the automobile industry and the motor car world in general on the enterprising Toledo manufacturer. It makes him the first manufacturer of automobiles to enter the price field heretofore exclusive to but one light car manufacturer.

The "Whippet," which has been in production for more than 18 months, holds the national fuel economy record of 43.28 miles to the gallon in a test between Los Angeles and New York City, covering a distance of 3,559 miles, under official observation of the A. A. A. In a speed test on Rockingham Speedway, Salem, N. H., a "Whippet" recently attained a speed of 71.6 miles an hour over a 50-mile route. This was officially timed.

The same engine that has accomplished these records is the power plant employed in the perfected "Whippet," now offered at the lowest price in the history of Willys-Overland.

The "Whippet" was the first light car to be equipped with four wheel brakes, setting a new trend in the light car field. The braking area of the "Whippet's" brakes is greater than any other light car.

Details of the perfected "Whippet" disclose a wider range of colors, employment of full crowned fenders, a new cadet sun visor that imparts a smart military effect, and the addition of automatic windshield cleaner, rear view mirror, and a combination rear driving light and stop light. These additions make the "Whippet" the most fully equipped light car built in the four cylinder field.

Cannery Waste Utilized

Tomato cannery waste, formerly discarded, has been discovered to be worth 6 cents a gallon in Italy, where laundries now utilize it to remove stains from linen, particularly collars. The clothes are soaked in vats of the diluted cannery by-product for an hour, by which time the stains are so thoroughly loosened that they can be washed out with little soap and practically no rubbing.—Popular Mechanics Magazine.

Iowa Woman Found Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Always Helpful

Vinton, Iowa.—"When I was seventeen years old I had to stay at home from school. I finally had to quit school, I was so weak. I suffered for about two years before I took Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, then I picked up one of your books and read it. I began taking the medicine. Now I am a housekeeper with six children, and I have taken it before each one was born. I cannot tell you all the good I have received from it. When I am not as well as can be I take it. I have been doing this for over thirteen years and it always helps me. I read all of your little books I can get and I tell everyone I know what the Vegetable Compound does for me."—Mrs. Frank Sellers, 510 7th Avenue, Vinton, Iowa.

Many girls in the fourth generation are learning through their own personal experiences the beneficial effects of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. Mothers who took it when they were young are glad to recommend it to their daughters.

For over half a century, women have praised this reliable medicine.

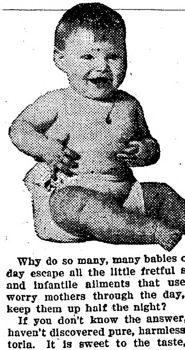
The BABY



Why do so many, many babies of today escape all the little fretful spells and infantile ailments that used to worry mothers through the day, and keep them up half the night?

If you don't know the answer, you haven't discovered pure, harmless Castoria. It is sweet to the taste, and sweet in the little stomach. And its gentle influence seems felt all through the tiny system. Not even a distasteful dose of castor oil does so much good.

Fletcher's Castoria is purely vegetable, so you may give it freely, at first sign of colic; or constipation; or diarrhea. Or those many times when you just don't know what is the matter. For real sickness, call the doctor, always. At other times, a few drops of Fletcher's Castoria.

The doctor often tells you to do just that; and always says Fletcher's. Other preparations may be just as pure, just as free from dangerous drugs, but why experiment? Besides, the book on care and feeding of babies that comes with Fletcher's Castoria is worth its weight in gold!

MINNESOTA BRIEFS

St. Paul—Motor accidents in St. Paul dropped from 2,645 in 1926, to 2,061 in 1927. There were 42 deaths

St. Paul—Approximately 1,000 1928 automobile license plates were issued from the office of Mike Holm, secretary of state, the first day of distribution.

Litchfield—Even though more than six months distant, plans for the annual convention of the State Christian Endeavor society here June 20-23, plans are beginning to take shape.

St Paul—Samuel D. Works, former state senator and insurance commissioner in the administration of Governor Hammand, died at his home in Orlando, Fla.

Norwood—When the 60-acre farm of Henry Harjes near Hamburg was purchased for $17,000, an average of $283 an acre, land prices in Carver county struck a new high level for recent years.

Rochester—No. 13, symbol of bad luck, is just No. 13 to George M. Granger of Rochester, it developed when he was given that license number plate for 1928, at his own request, by Mike Holm, secretary of state.

St. Paul—Justice Quinn given cane. Members of the state supreme court presented a snakewood cane mounted with gold to Associate Justice James H. Quinn on the occasion of his retirement after 30 years of service.

Minneapolis — Five men kidnaped the night marshal at Mora, and after robbing four business places of $174 and a quantity of whisky and cigarets, brought the man to Minneapolis where they left him blindfolded "somewhere in the business district."

Hawley—Knud Wefald filed for the farmer-labor party nomination as representative in congress from the ninth Minnesota district with Mike Holm, secretary of state. Wefald, after two terms in congress, was defeated at the last election by C. G. Selvig, Crookston, republican.

St. Paul—The Minnesota Crop Improvement association will conduct its annual meeting of the University of Minnesota school of agriculture January 18, in connection with the program of the farmers and homemakers week short course at the farm school January 16 to 21.

Albert Lea—Twelve persons who were overcome when a gas main exploded here were recovered while members of 10 families, driven into the street during the explosion, returned to their homes after a two-day absence. The explosion occurred when the temperature was 15 below zero.

St. Paul—The 175,139 farms in Minnesota have a total acreage of 29,145,234 acres, according to N. J. Holmberg, state commissioner of agriculture, in making public the results of the 1927 farm census taken by assessors. This shows a decrease in acreage of land devoted to crops of 3.3 per cent relative to all land in farms, compared with the state farm census showings of 1925.

Detroit Lakes—The Chippewa tribal custom of slaying the aged and infirm has failed as a murder defense in the paleface court. Alex Jourdan, a Chippewa, pleaded guilty to slaying his 90-year-old mother-in-law, and was sentenced to life imprisonment. Jourdan pleaded that his mother-in-law was old, blind and feeble, and that a custom of his tribe prescribed that such persons should be hurried on the journey to the happy hunting grounds.

Minneapolis—More than 15,000 motorcar dealers and garage men from throughout the northwest have been invited to attend the Twin City National Auto Show, to be staged in the Municipal Auditorium February 4 to 11. With asurance that all railroads entering the twin cities will provide fare-and-a-half rate, show officials are preparing for the greatest midwinter crowd the city has ever entertained.

St. Paul—The dominant issue of the annual meeting of the Minnesota Agricultural Society, at St. Paul Jan. 10 to 13, according to a preliminary canvass of delegates will center about the re-election of Thomas H. Canfield, as secretary of the 1928 Minnesota State Fair. Among those prominently mentioned as possible successors are Herman Roe, of Northfield, and John C. Simpson, of Chicago, a former secretary of the State Fair.

Minneapolis — Congressman Clyde Kelly of Pittsburgh, representing the thirty-third Pennsylvania district in the national House of Representatives, and D. C. Keller, president of the Dow Drug Co., Cincinnati, and former president of the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce, are among the nationally prominent men who will address the forty-fourth annual convention of the Minnesota State Pharmaceutical association at the Nicollet hotel, Minneapolis, February 14, 15 and 16. The arrangements committee is building a program with the idea, according to Chairman John Dargavel, of attracting at least 1,000 retail druggists to the convention.

St. Paul—Minnesota broke all records during 1927 in its export trade, E. M. Zwickel, district manager of the northwest office of the bureau of foreign and domestic commerce reported. He estimated the year's total exports from this state at $100,000,000.

Duluth—A statewide systematic wolf hunt, headed by gamewardens, is urged by the West Duluth Sportsman Club. Big game hunters of the state are urged to join to "destroy the wolves now making serious inroads on the deer and moose of the district."

At Least Would Have Beecher's Good Wishes

A capital Henry Ward Beecher story is told by Joseph Bucklin Bishop in "Notes and Anecdotes of Many Years." At a Friday evening prayer meeting—Mr. Bishop was present—a man arose and with an air of "Watch me now and see me put him a poser," asked Mr. Beecher a question—it being question time.

"I should like to suppose," he said, "the case of a man who lives an upright and moral life; who is a faithful husband, a kind and generous father, a good citizen, taking part in all good works, gives freely to charity; in short, leads a life above reproach. Yet he is a pronounced disbeliever in Christianity, never goes to church and is nothing less than an atheist.

"Now, Mr. Beecher, I should like to ask you: 'Where does that man go when he dies?'"

Without changing his position Mr. Beecher with an engaging smile, replied:

"He would have my good wishes wherever he goes."

Consolation Found in Firm Religious Belief

I envy no quality of mind or intellect in others—not genius, power, wit, or fancy; but if I could choose what would be most delightful, and I believe most useful to me, I should prefer a firm religious belief to every other blessing, for it makes life a discipline of goodness, creates new hopes when all earthly hopes vanish; and throws over the decay, the destruction of existence, the most gorgeous of all lights; awakens life even in death, and from corruption and decay calls up beauty and divinity; makes an instrument of torture and of shame the ladder of ascent to paradise; and far above all combination of earthly hopes, calls up the most delightful visions, palms and amaranths, the gardens of the blessed; the security of everlasting joys, where the sensualist and skeptic view only gloom, decay and annihilation.—Sir Humphrey Davy.

SHORT LESSONS IN DAIRYING

A series of 52 articles by Land O' Lakes Creameries and published by the Farmers Cooperative Creamery in the interests of its patrons.

LESSON VII.

Cream Cooling Tank: Creameries that have the most cream cooling tanks in use among the patrons receive the most Sweet Cream for making a high quality butter.

A cream cooling tank may be bought for $10 to $12 or be home-made out of cement, or it may be made out of a barrel for a small herd. It should be large enough to hold at least one large and one small can, as the fresh cream should always be kept separate until it is thoroughly cooled.

The cream cooling tank is set near the well and the water pumped directly into it and then piped on to the stock tank so that all the water flows thru the cooler. A small house should be built over it to keep out the heat in summer and cold in winter. Cream shoud be kept in cold water in winter as well as summer, so it will cool quickly and keep from freezing.

Minnesota Wool Growers Association Did Big Wool Business In 1927

Our Association has handled to date about 650,000 lbs. of 1927 wool with shipments still straggling in. This is an increase of about 15 per cent over last year's receipts.

At the present time our membership is about 1400 and our patrons number about 1700. Applications for memberships are continually coming in.

We held the major part of our Half blood and Fine for over two months for a price that would net our growers 37c f. o. b. Wabasha. About a week ago we finally obtained this price. We are now completing account sales on all our grading sheets to net our growers as follows:

Bright 1-2 & Fine Staple	—37c	f. o. b.	Wabasha
Bright 3-8, 1st Pool	—36c	"	"
Bright 3-8, 2nd Pool	—39½c	"	"
Bright 1-4, 1st Pool	—35½c	"	"
Bright 1-4, 2nd Hool	—39½c	"	"

Our Last Big Sale On Clear Bright Medium Wool Was At 44c Delivered. These grades compromise about 85 per cent of our total receipts. The lower grades take proportionately lower prices.

Our prices to growers appear again to give general satisfaction and are materially better than the averge country prices by the local buyers. We have very general information from our patrons that our patronage will increase materially again this coming year.

We are gradually establishing a reputation in the Wool Trade on wools handled thru our Association for superiority in quality and condition of fleece. This fact is confirmed by our sales compared with sales by others of even dates and similar wools.

THE FARMER'S BEST WAY OUT

Dean Russell of Wisconsin College of Agriculture says: "Two things have hit the farmer hard but the same things have hit business. They are increase in cost of production and decline in prices which latter has been more drastic in farm products than manufactured products. The farmer's political friends say salvation can be found through legislation. Our legislative doctors propose price control. The difficulty with this is price control always means price elevation which always produces expansion in production and if this occurs without expansion in consumption you have inevitable decline in prices. The remedy works to produce the very opposite result from that intended.

"Another legislative panacea would make it easier to borrow, as if running into debt was the solution of the difficulty. There are farmers who wish it had not been quite so easy to borrow because the inevitable day comes when they have to pay principal and interest. The third legislative remedy would make easier the pathway for cooperative endeavor. All you have to do is to wave the magic wand 'Cooperation' and all the farmer's difficulties will immediately disappear. I wonder if there is any government that can make people cooperate. The success of cooperative effort will lie in organization from the bottom up rather than from the top down and it will take a decade or two for the results to be felt.

"The farmers have at hand a remedy that can be utilized immediately with the definite knowledge that it will secure far better results. If they will take a leaf out of present day business methods they will have relief in agriculture they will not have to wait for. Business has suffered the same as the farmer, yet business came through in a way that is far ahead of the farmer. This has been brought about through industrial efficiency, through improvement of methods. They have increased labor output per unit to the degree the costs of production have actually been reduced by better methods of carrying on work. Industrial enterprises on a large scale are spending millions on research. In ten years automobile output per worker has increased 172 per cent, tires 211 per cent, oil 83 per cent, cement 61 per cent.

"Compare that with others. The packers have increased only 27 per cent, sugar refining 28 per cent, boots and shoes only 8 per cent. There has been an increase in agriculture since 1913 of 20 per cent. It is doubtful that business has any such opportunity as exists in agriculture to reduce cost of production through improved methods. Take corn,—Iowa shows a variation in cost of production from fifteen cents to seventy-five cents a bushel. In Illinois the cost of producing corn on 80 acre fields was reduced from fifty-two cents to twenty cents a bushel. The manufacturer who had it within his power to reduce production costs from fifty-two to thirty cents per unit would be tickled to death with the opportunity of meeting competition under these conditions.

"The way out for the farmer is (1) to become a business man, (2) to adopt business methods, to adapt himself to the same kind of conditions and be as efficiently mobile as is our manufacturer or our business man in the ordinary channels of his trade, (3) to rely less upon political promises and more upon individual initiative, (4) to work toward cooperative endeavor, but in the meantime not to wait for cooperative endeavor to solve all of these problems because individually he can do something at the present time."

WOMEN OF MIDDLE AGE

Praise Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Mrs. Annie Kwinski of 526 1st Avenue, Milwaukee, Wis., writes that she became so weak and run-down that she was not able to do her housework. She saw the name Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound in the paper and said to her husband, "I will try that medicine and see if it will help me." She says she took six bottles and is feeling much better.

Mrs. Mattie Adams, who lives in Downing Street, Brewton, Ala., writes as follows: "A friend recommended Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and since taking it I feel like a different woman."

With her children grown up, the middle-aged woman finds time to do the things she never had time to do before—read the new books, see the new plays, enjoy her grand-children, take an active part in church and civic affairs. Far from being pushed aside by the younger set, she finds a full, rich life of her own. That is, if her health is good.

Thousands of women past fifty, say they owe their vigor and health to Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and are recommending it to their friends and neighbors.

Much Alike

"Sometimes I get to thinking about the folks in other towns where I have been," said old Riley Rezzidew. "They just putter around at their tasks, bragging how they put it all over so-and-so, relating their symptoms, trying to get ahead of the other feller, etc. Here in Petunia we are arresting and getting arrested, setting out in the public square, cussing the legislature, and the like, just about like all other towns, big and little. But of course Petunia is the biggest little town anywheres around."—Kansas City Star.

All things may be possible, but how can a bald-headed suitor tell a girl he would dye for her?

A stitch in time may close the mouths of nine gossips.

Have Kidneys Examined By Your Doctor

Take Salts to Wash Kidneys if Back Pains You or Bladder Bothers

Flush your kidneys by drinking a quart of water each day, also take salts occasionally, says a noted authority, who tells us that too much rich food forms acids which almost paralyze the kidneys in their efforts to expel it from the blood. They become sluggish and weaken; then you may suffer with a dull misery in the kidney region, sharp pains in the back or sick headache, dizziness, your stomach sours, tongue is coated, and when the weather is bad you have rheumatic twinges. The urine gets cloudy, full of sediment, the channels often get sore and [illegible]ted, obliging you to seek relief tw[illegible] three times during the night.

To help neutralize these irritating acids, to help cleanse the kidneys and flush off the body's urinous waste, get four ounces of Jad Salts from any pharmacy here; take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast for a few days, and your kidneys may then act fine. This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to help flush and stimulate sluggish kidneys; also to neutralize the acids in the system so they no longer irritate, thus often relieving bladder weakness.

Jad Salts is inexpensive, cannot injure and makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink.

Relief from Kidney and Bladder Trouble. Don't let these organs make a martyr of you. Heed the first warning that "things are not right." Drink freely of water and take Gold Medal Haarlem Oil Capsules. A world famous remedy for kidney, liver, bladder and uric acid troubles since 1696.

STORY FROM THE START

Handsome, fastidious and wealthy—young St. Croix Creighton awaits his sweetheart at their trysting place. She is late, this ordinary little Pennsylvania Dutch girl, Meely Schwenckton. Despite her seeming innocence and ignorance, she succeeds in keeping him at a distance, to his chagrin. Meely, in the Schwenckton home, where she is boarding, is altogether unlike the girl who meets St. Croix clandestinely. She is the teacher in the neighborhood school, of which Marvin Creighton, St. Croix' brother, is superintendent. Meely learns that Marvin was to have married his cousin, a titled English lady, but, believing she was attracted by the Creighton wealth, had refused the alliance. It is the rumor that St. Croix is to take Marvin's place and marry the English girl. St. Croix' jealousy is aroused by Meely's report of an aged suitor for her hand.

CHAPTER III—Continued

"I'll hide 'em good away," she said slyly. "I'd like to leave 'em all taste 'em, at home, but it would look suspicious!"

"I want a reward!" he said.

She drew back a bit; but he suddenly snatched her face firmly between his two hands and brought his lips to hers—almost. With a wrench of her head she averted the contact, and his touch, as usual, met only her cool cheek instead of her rosy mouth.

"You always kiss me so onexpected!" she said breathlessly, looking flushed and almost frightened. "I wisht you wouldn't always get me so onexpected!"

"Meely!" He took hold of her shoulders and turned her right about face. "You're going to hold perfectly still and let me kiss you right—on—your—lips!"

She tried to pull herself free, but he held her in a relentless grip. "Hold still!"

"I won't!" she snapped, holding her face averted. "Le' me be! Please le' me be, Mr. Creighton!"

"Meely! Why don't you ever let me kiss you on the mouth?"

She hung her head and answered shyly, "My lips is for the man I marry!"

"But, Meely, my girl, you must know," he said in a low voice in which his suppressed passion quivered, "that I want much more than your lips! Or why, my dear, would I be spending so much time with you?"

"Ach!" She raised a radiant, sparkling face to his. "Do you want to marry me, Mr. Creighton?"

His hands fell from her shoulders; he turned from her and bent his eyes to the ground.

"Ach," she apologized humbly, "that time I guess I went too far! But, Mr. Creighton, what is it, then, you want?"

He turned again and looked at her. "Meely! I'm d—d if I know whether you're as innocent and ignorant as an angel or as deep as hell.

"You and I both know, my dear little girl, that we're not spending all these hours together, week after week, for the pleasure of each other's conversation!"

She shook her head hopelessly. "It's always wondered me why you want to set 'round talkin' to a dumb thing like me, so oneducated as what I am, and ignorant like you say angels is—"

"Why do you pretend not to know why it is?" His voice was a little thick and husky; his hand hot which clasped her cool one lying in her lap.

The innocence of a new-born babe was in the eyes she raised to his. "Deedn't I don't. Why do you?" But before the burning hunger of his eyes she recoiled; and drawing her hand from his clasp, she rose hastily and walked away.

"Meely!" he called.

Slowly she turned and came back to him; and with a childishly obvious effort to divert his attention from herself, she spoke to him ingratiatingly of what she felt sure would have that effect. "Ach, Mr. Creighton, did you know your brother is livin' right on our farm, with our hard man and his wife?"

"With your hired man!" St. Croix exclaimed, an angry flush covering his face and neck. "Living with him! He would!" he added bitterly. "That's the sort of society he seems to prefer—farm hands and miners!"

"And you, too," said Meely, with her ingratiating smile, "like low-down comp'ny—ain't? It must run in your fambly."

"If you're referring to yourself as 'low-down,' kindly don't do it again—it's insulting to my taste!" He drew her roughly to him and she nestled into his embrace.

"Please tell me," she coaxed, "about your brother. He ain't the swell gen'leman you are, is he?"

"He doesn't know you, does he?"

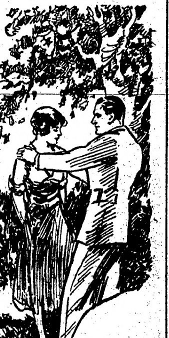
"Not yet."

"But," said St. Croix anxiously, "he's bound to meet you, of course?"

"I guess mebby."

"Don't give us away—our meeting up here!"

"Ach, no, for my Pop would kill me if he knowed—have knew. But it does wonder me, Mr. Creighton, that your brother would board at Absalom Puntz', as common as what they are yet! My land's sakes alive! Why does he do it? Why don't he live at his own home with yous?"



She Hung Her Head and Answered Shyly, "My Lips Is for the Man I Marry!"

"None of your business, my dear!"

She pouted. "I'll get it out of Absalom's missus, then. Or I'll meet up with your brother hisself at Absalom's and get it out of him."

"Oh, no, you won't ask him!" St. Croix shrugged. "People don't ask my brother Marvin impertinent questions!"

"Is he so proud, too, like you?"

"His pride," St. Croix sneered, "takes another form than that of the rest of the family! His 'pride' won't let him live, he says, on the 'charity of miners'!—won't let him take more than six per cent interest on our invested capital!—insisting that all the rest should be turned over to the miners and to the upkeep and safeguarding of the industry! Talks d—d rot like that! Bolshevism! That's what it is! D—d Bolsshevism!"

"Is it? Why, I didn't know Bolshevism was so nice and kind and generous like that! I thought they was a lot of cut-throats, them Bolshevists."

"So they are! The poor cutting the throats of the rich to make themselves rich!"

"But your brother ain't poor."

"He and all of us would be if we ran the mines as he thinks they should be run! If he ever does come into his share of the mines he'll ruin the whole business, his share and mine, too, d—n him! Oh, don't let's talk of him! My father and I see red at the sound of his name!"

"And your mother, too?"

"He's breaking her heart!" St. Croix said with sincere feeling. "Disgracing the family by living with common laborers! Turning school-teacher! Making us the talk of the whole state! It's almost killing my mother!"

"But," Meely protested, puzzled, "I can't see he's doin' anything bad! It's just that he wants to act kinder to other ones than any of yous wants to."

"It's his quarreling with my father and leaving home that hurts my mother so, and makes her suffer!"

"Why's he so different to what yous all are? Why ain't he greedy, too, to hog all for hisself?" she sweetly asked.

"We're not 'hogging all' for ourselves! Do you know what we pay annually to the people who work for us?" He named a hugely impressive sum. "And you talk about our 'hogging all' for ourselves!"

"But why does your brother talk that way, then, if it ain't? What makes him different to yous?" she persisted.

"Oh, from the time he was a kid he's argued with my father about the management of the mines and the way the miners' families have been housed and paid. And at times of strikes he'd howl 'round at sight of the women and children looking starved. And just recently, when a miner who'd worked for us for twenty years was killed and his widow and children had to vacate their cottage, Marvin raised h—l! Wanted her pensioned; wanted Father to give her the house she'd lived in for twenty years; wanted him to educate her children—all sorts of things that would have established the worst sort of precedent." St. Croix paused, realizing he was using words beyond her range.

But she answered, "Do you call the Golden Rule in business the worst sort of—"

She, in her turn, stopped short—and hastily changed the subject. "But I guess your brother'll soon have to find another boarding place, for Absalom's soon moving to town. So, then, when Absalom moves, mebby the new farm hand Pop hars won't take your brother to board. And mebby," said—Meely suddenly, "my Pop might take him! Say, wouldn't that be a scream, Mr. Creighton?"

St. Croix privately decided that in the face of such a contingency his only prudent course would be to put an end to these sweet secret meetings with Meely; for the Creighton family had learned to their cost that Marvin's eccentric conscience was a thing to be reckoned with.

But even as he came to this decision he realized that it could not be done. He could not give up this girl. At whatever cost short of marrying her (that, of course, an impossibility) he would have her; and the cost, in view of his present delicate position in relation to his English cousin, might prove high indeed! But he would pay it rather than give her up!

He was not used to giving up things. His self-control was flabby from lack of exercise.

It never occurred to him that when he was quite ready to take the girl she would not readily come to him. Had he all along supposed her to be a "virtuous" maiden, he would not, at this moment, be here in this spot with her. But although he was not a despoiler of virtue, a man without heart or conscience, he certainly was not above accepting such gifts of life as the gods vouchsafed to him.

St. Croix' conscience, though not troubled as to his relation with Meely, was by no means at peace when he thought of the cousin whom he hoped to marry. He sentimentally felt that to go to his bride straight from a love affair with a "common" girl like Meely would be to wrong her (not Meely, but the bride) and the struggle that went on in his soul between his ideal of what the bridegroom of a high-born and immaculate lady should be and his compelling infatuation for the farm girl was at times bitter and devastating.

But there was never any real doubt in his mind as to which side in that struggle would win.

CHAPTER IV

Meely knew just enough about the profession of teaching to know that she knew shockingly little about it; and her dread, therefore, of the county superintendent's impending visit to her school was a sword over her head.

"If I only knew what he expects (or hopes) to find me doing when he comes, I'd be doing it or making a bluff at doing it!"

She knew that to a professional teacher her methods must seem grotesquely unprofessional, being based on the same principle as that by which she lived most of her life—or tried to; that principle being the imperative need to extract all the entertainment possible from any situation in which you found yourself. So she worked really very hard to make her days in her schoolroom yield entertainment, first to herself, and secondly to forty rather bucolic children of all ages and sects (Amish, New and Old Mennonites, Dunkards) who filled her school. A few vigorous and tiresome hours were devoted to drilling in geography, multiplication tables, grammar, spelling (she suspected that the way she did that drilling would have made any real pedagogue shudder) and the rest of the time was delightfully spent in teaching what she, not the school trustees, thought children ought to know—fairy stories, poems, plays.

Avoid the Cynic

If you want to retain a wholesome view of life, if you want to hold your faith in mankind, if you want to have enduring peace of mind keep away from cynics. Should any such be among your acquaintance, give them a wide berth. They may be bright, clever, entertaining people. Cynics often are. But they are poisonous people.—Chicago News.

Good Hearing Linked Up With Good Health

Experiments completed by the Boston university school of medicine and the Evans Memorial institute disclose that well-conditioned athletes have better hearing, in general, than any other class of persons tested. Positive correlation between physical fitness and acuteness of hearing was found by the experts.

Among those examined were groups of individuals whose daily work might be expected to develop especially keen ears, such as telephone operators, telegraphers and radio operators. Although many of these had unusual aptitudes, in general excellence of hearing they were surpassed by the athletes.

Many of the special aptitudes disclosed were amazing to the physicians. One telegrapher, with his right ear to the instrument, could listen to a message coming over the wire, decode and type it, using both hands, and at the same time, with a telephone receiver held to the left ear by a support, he could carry on a conversation over the ordinary telephone circuit.

A radio operator had the ability to listen to two messages on the same wave length received with similar intensity, one sent in Morse code and the other in international dots and dashes. He could distinguish each from the other and could decode and copy either at will. The man had developed the ability to ignore interfering signals to a high degree.

HIGHWAY SYSTEM FINEST IN WEST

Trunk System Extends To All Parts of State—Development Rapid.

The Minnesota Highway System has been the object of praise and admiration from visitors who have come to the state from near and far in the last few years. For the amount of money spent, Minnesota has probably achieved greater results than any state in the Union.

There are two reasons for this. One is that Minnesota has an abundance of gravel which makes an ideal road for moderate traffic under normal weather conditions. The other is that Minnesota has a "road system" instead of merely a number of good roads. The Babcock plan, so-called after C. M. Babcock, who has been State Highway Commissioner the last ten years, not only provided a system of primary roads connecting all the county seats and almost all other cities and villages of 1,000 or more people, but it also made provision for the improvement of the secondary and local roads in proportion to the traffic they bear.

Under State Control

The trunk highways in Minnesota are entirely under state control. The plan was adopted by the voters in 1920 and put into effect by the legislature of 1921. Within a few weeks temporary routes had been selected and a maintenance organization covering the entire system had been put to work. In addition to local patrol work, the maintenance division began the graveling and reshaping of many routes which could not at once be permanently improved, and the construction division began preparing plans and letting contracts for grading, graveling and paving the more heavily traveled routes.

Only a limited amount of paving, where traffic was so heavy that maintenance of gravel roads was impossible, was undertaken. At the end of 1926, nearly 4,000 miles had been brought to permanent grade. As to surfacing, 833 miles were paved, 229 bituminous treated, 4,151 had heavy gravel, 1,044 light gravel and 674 were maintained earth or sand-clay. Thus Minnesota, in a very short time, was brought out of the mud. Two years ago the department undertook to keep the roads open in winter. Minnesota now has a road system which, with the exception of periods of unusually heavy snow or rain, are open and passable all the year around. Even last winter, with the heaviest snow in a decade, the roads were kept better than 95 per cent open.

Minnesota has probably one of the most efficient maintenance organizations in the country. The state is divided into sixteen maintenance districts, each under a local superintendent. On the unpaved roads there is a local patrolman every seven or eight miles, who goes over his stretch daily in summer, and in winter whenever conditions require. These men use both team and motor graders for smoothing the highways, clean and repair ditches, cut weeds, fill chuck holes as they develop and do anything and everything else which may add to the safety and comfort of the road user. This is supplemented by special motor patrol maintenance, regraveling, reshaping and other special maintenance.

Safety a Factor

Safety has also been a prime factor in all construction plans. In five years 382 railroad grade crossings have been eliminated. Sharp turns and steep grades and other hazards have been eliminated wherever possible and others are plainly marked. Pavements have a minimum width of 18 feet and gravel roads are surfaced to a width of 24 feet or more on all grades built since the state took over the system. On the heavily traveled routes which have not been paved, oil, tar and calcium chloride are being used to protect the surface and keep the dust down.

Some tourists and visitors may not be greatly interested in the arguments relative to the virtue of paved roads. Commissioner C. M. Babcock has repeatedly recommended that funds be provided for a more extensive paving program. He is urging paving as a means of reducing maintenance expenditures and providing roads that will reduce vehicle operating costs to the man who uses the roads the year around. Another virtue of paving is that it is uniformly good the year around, and is not affected by the spring break-up or other periods of excessive moisture when the unpaved roads become poor and often impassable. But in the touring months, May to October, the gravel roads and even the maintained earth roads are uniformly good. Tests made with a "roughometer" have confirmed the popular impression that many gravel roads in Minnesota during the summer season are "smooth as pavement." The man who is driving for business or other reasons, to get to a certain place, nearly always prefers the pavement, but the summer tourist often prefers the gravel roads as being less monotonous.

On Minnesota trunk highways the traveler knows no county lines or local boundaries. This causes much favorable comment from those who have traveled in other states, where highway improvement is dependent on county financing and where it is a common experience to change suddenly from a very good road to a very poor road when you cross the county line.

While Mr. Babcock's aim in all highway improvement has been to serve first the Minnesota car owner the year around, scenic effects and the things that please tourists have not been neglected. When there was a choice of two routes and other things were equal, the route which followed a lake shore or a river bank, or passed through or by some historic spot or natural scenery was given the preference.

Gain National Fame

Two Minnesota highways are rapidly gaining national fame as scenic roads. Trunk Highway No. 3 along the Mississippi River and Trunk Highway No. 1 along the north shore of Lake Superior. But wherever the tourist goes on the Minnesota trunk highways, there is an ever-changing panorama of prosperous farms, grain and corn and dairy herds and beautiful homes, then thriving industrial centers, then lakes, ten thousand of them, and cool forests and streams and waterfalls, and farther north, the great iron ranges which furnish two-thirds of all the ore mined in America.

Development of the secondary roads in Minnesota has kept pace with improvement of the trunk highways. The trunk highway plan released the money in the state aid fund, which amounts to nearly $2,000,000 annually, for use on the main county roads. There are 14,423 miles of state aid roads of which 9,400 are surfaced. A large percentage of the local roads are also surfaced, a recent survey by the U. S. Bureau of Public Roads showing that on the trunk highways, secondary and local roads taken together, Minnesota has about 25,000 miles of surfaced road, nearly one-fourth of its entire road mileage. Only four states, New York, Ohio, Indiana and Wisconsin, have a larger number of miles surfaced. Many states, like Illinois and California, which have a larger mileage of paved roads than Minnesota, are far behind Minnesota in the mileage of surfaced secondary roads.

The improvement and maintenance of the Minnesota trunk highways is financed entirely by the auto license fees, the gasoline tax, and federal aid. The state aid fund comes from a one mill tax on all property within the county, so that only the town roads are paid for entirely by the rural property owners.

STOCK MARKETS ALWAYS HIGHEST

South St. Paul Packing Plants Take Much of Minnesota Livestock Production.

One of Minnesota's big business assets and a large factor in the progress and prosperity of the Northwest is the South St. Paul livestock market, which has become one of the great livestock centers in the nation.

Approximately $150,000,000 per year is paid to Northwest farmers and stockmen for livestock sold on this market.

From the time the yards were opened — September 30, 1887—the South St. Paul market has made progress consummate with the growth and expansion of the territory it serves and over the period of its existence its greatest accomplishment perhaps is the permanent place it has given agriculture in the Northwest states. It is the outlet for thousands of carloads of livestock every year.

Receipts of livestock at South St. Paul in 1926 totaled 1,180,240 head of cattle, 729,703 calves, 3,450,637 hogs, 772,932 sheep, and 10,131 horses.

In this connection, President T. E. Good of the St. Paul Union Stock Yards Company, stated in his last annual report:

High Record Year

"Nineteen Twenty-six was another good year for this market. A new high record for total receipts was established with 88,279 cars of stock received by rail and 59,993 loads of stock by automobile truck, an increase of 3,875 rail carloads and 12,656 truck loads over 1925. Transposing truck receipts to a railroad car basis, there is an increase of 2,217 cars, a total increase for the year equivalent to 6,092 railroad cars."

For the past several years South St. Paul has held first place as a commercial dairy cow center and as a point of supply for stocker and feeder pigs. In both of these phases of the livestock industry the market also has enjoyed the distinction of furnishing buyers with the best material obtainable.

In 1926, 3,450,637 hogs were marketed here and of these eighty-nine per cent were purchased for local slaughter. This contrasts greatly with the prevalent opinion in the early days of the market that South St. Paul never would be a large hog market, as it was out of the corn belt, and corn could not be grown in Northern states.

Experiments proved to the contrary, however, and with the South St. Paul livestock and packing industries furnishing the demand for hogs, Northwest farmers have been able to make a very profitable addition to their category of farm operations and products.

South St. Paul is the gateway of the Northwest through which thousands of range bred cattle pour annually for distribution. Lying within the corn belt makes it doubly important as a distribution point for Western cattle, many of which are sold here to corn belt buyers to be returned later as a highly finished product ready for the block. Not only does it rank high with other markets by way of receipts, but it is second to no other market in modern and complete equipment with which to give its patrons the utmost service possible.

Recently constructed cattle and hog doubledecks add greatly to the yard age capacity and provide shelter during stormy weather for thousands of cattle, calves and hogs. The cattle doubledeck, with storage pens for 3,000 head, approximately, represents an innovation in cattle yarding equipment. The hog doubledeck adds room for about 9,000 head, both buildings taking up an entire yard "block". These additions to yard structures make room for capacity holdings of more than 40,000 cattle, 60,000 hogs and 10,000 sheep with the yards in operation.

All things considered, the Northwest owes much to the South St. Paul market.

Minnesota's lowest altitude, along the shore of Lake Superior, is 602 feet above sea level.

Getting There by Rocket

Scientists of many nationalities are interested in experiments which are now taking place with a giant rocket, which combines the features of a firework and an airplane. The scheme, which, though it sounds fantastic, is said to be practical enough in reality, is to shoot passengers across the Atlantic at a speed which the inventor, Professor Goddard, of Clark university, declares would be far greater than that of Lindbergh during his recent Transatlantic flight. A number of tests have proved that it would be quite possible to propel such a rocket an enormous distance beyond the earth's gravity by a series of explosions, and to send from New York to London would be a comparatively simple matter.

One hardly knows what trouble is unless it is the kind that makes him lose his appetite.

Occasionally women try to reform a man by roasting him.

The BABY
No mother in this enlightened age would give her baby something she did not know was perfectly harmless, especially when a few drops of plain Castoria will right a baby's stomach and end almost any little ill. Fretfulness and fever, too; it seems no time until everything is serene.
That's the beauty of Castoria; its gentle influence seems just what is needed. It does all that castor oil might accomplish, without shock to the system. Without the evil taste. It's delicious! Being purely vegetable, you can give it as often as there's a sign of colic; constipation; diarrhea; or need to aid sound, natural sleep.
Just one warning: it is genuine Fletcher's Castoria that physicians recommend. Other preparations may be just as free from all doubtful drugs, but no child of this writer's is going to test them! Besides, the book on care and feeding of babies that comes with Fletcher's Castoria is worth its weight in gold.

Junior's Play to a No Trump

IF SENIOR'S first lead is low in his own suit, junior should play his highest card and if he wins the trick return his next highest at once.

If senior's lead is high in his own suit, junior must think at once about unblocking. Unblocking in your partner's suit is playing in such a way that you will not win the trick upon which you play your last card of that suit. For instance: Suppose that senior opens with a King, follows with the Ace, and then leads the Jack; and that junior holds the Queen and two small ones. The natural way for junior to play would be his two small ones on his partner's Ace and King. But if he does this he will win the third trick and be unable to lead back. Thus senior will be left holding some good cards which he cannot make unless he happens to get the lead in another suit. The proper way to unblock is to hold the lowest card of that suit until the last.

In the case given above—if junior holds the Queen, seven and three he should play the seven on senior's King, the Queen on the Ace and then his last card, the three, would fall on senior's Jack, leaving the lead with senior to make the remaining cards of that suit. If senior leads the Queen and junior holds King and one small one he should play the King on the Queen, and if it wins lead back his small one. If the opening lead at no trump is an Ace it calls upon partner to play his highest card—thus to unblock quickly and vigorously.

If senior's first lead is low in junior's suit it indicates length or an honor, and if junior wins the trick he should lead back low hoping that senior's honor may catch declarer's stopper for that suit. If senior leads high in junior's suit and junior can place the other high cards in such a way as to know that declarer holds one higher one which cannot be caught, he should play low, because he wishes to get declarer's high card out as soon as possible while senior still holds one of that suit.

Suppose, for instance, that senior leads the ten and that junior holds the Ace, King, Jack, eight and five and dummy exposes the nine, seven and two. Junior can feel very certain that declarer has the Queen and two small ones, and that if he (junior) wins the first trick with the Ace and then continues the suit with the King and Jack, declarer will win the third trick with his Queen and then senior will have none of the suit left to lead in case he gets in the lead again. In this case junior would have two good cards which he could not make unless he had a re-entry in another suit. However, if he plays low on senior's lead of the ten, declarer will have to play his Queen on the first trick and then four tricks are set up in this suit, which may be taken whenever senior or junior gets the lead.

Declarer's Play of a Declared Trump

After senior has led to the first trick and dummy's cards have been spread on the table, declarer should stop to look over the two hands and estimate their probable value. By taking two or three minutes at that time to lay out a campaign for the play of the entire hand, he will save much more time than this as the play proceeds. Moreover, such a preliminary survey often enables him to avoid mistakes which might cost him the game.

Some of the points to be decided at this time are: Shall he extract trumps at once; which suit shall he play first; what finesses shall he take; from which hand shall be lead each suit; has he enough entry cards in each hand to play the way he wishes to, or, if not, can he create one or more by playing his cards in a certain order. If senior opens with a small card of a suit in which he has bid, declarer knows that he has three higher cards of that suit and probably one lower one. He should try to determine just what cards senior holds. Applying the rule of eleven will tell him how many junior holds above the one led, and this, together with seeing dummy and his own hand, should help him to place quite accurately all of the high cards. Many who have never tried to play auction in this way may think it a tremendously difficult task, but they will be surprised after playing a few games and holding these things in their minds how much they can figure out, and how greatly they will be benefited by knowledge gained in these ways.

Rumpless

The Rumpless fowls are very ancient. Tailless fowls are mentioned by Temminck in his earliest writings. They are also mentioned as the Rumpless or Persian cocks of Latham. Nearly 300 years ago this variety was known to Aldrovandi, who called them Persian fowls. Sononi and Temminck state that this fowl is a native of the Ceylon forests and is called by the natives Wallikikilli or Cock of the Woods. E. L. Layard, writing from Ceylon in 1850, says that the Rumpless fowl is a rare, tame introduction from Cochin. Rumpless fowls are bred in several varieties and colors; they are usually quite like the Brown-Red and the Duckwing Game fowls in color.

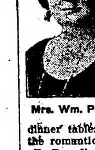
Foreign Dishes Bring Added Zest to Dinner

By MRS. WM. C. POST

Height of my culinary ambition always has been to make dinner each day a gastronomic poem, rounded and perfect like a stately rime. A meal that pleases eyes, nose and palate alike!



Mrs. Wm. Post.

A well-turned dinner is like a pretty woman in that it unlocks men's hearts with a magical key.

Exotic dishes give a tang of other lands to the dinner table. Things foreign awaken the romantic sense. Taste of codfish a'la Benedictine transports one for the minute to the Montmarte in gay Paris, a dash of Piroski and we are supping in a quaint cafe on the Nevsky Prospekt in Leningrad, while the crunch of English tea cakes may bring visions of the rolling moors of Sussex.

As an aid to the housewife in carrying out this new and fascinating idea in cooking, the following of my recipes may prove of particular interest:

Italian Polenta.

3 cups hot-cooked rice or mush
1½ tbsp. butter or olive oil

Beat the butter into the mush while hot. Turn onto a hot serving plate and pour over the following cheese sauce:

Cheese Sauce.

2 tbsp. fat
2 tbsp. flour
¼ tsp. salt
Dash pepper
½ cup evaporated milk diluted with
½ cup meat stock
¾ cup grated cheese

Melt the fat, add the flour, salt and pepper, and stir until the mass is smooth. Add the diluted milk and cook in a double boiler. Stir occasionally to keep smooth. Add grated cheese to the hot sauce and stir until melted or about three minutes.

Buffeten Kuchen.

1½ cups sugar
¼ cup butter
2 eggs, separated
1-3 cup evaporated milk diluted with
2-3 cup water
2½ cups flour
4 tsp. baking powder
Grated rind of 1 lemon
Chopped or sliced almonds

Cream butter and sugar, add yolks of eggs and the lemon rind, stirring constantly. Mix flour and baking powder, add to the butter mixture, alternately with the milk and lastly stir in the stiffly beaten whites of eggs. Place in well-greased shallow coffee cake tins, sprinkle with granulated sugar, cinnamon and a few almonds, sliced fine or chopped. Bake in a moderate oven.

SHORT LESSONS IN DAIRYING

A series of 52 articles by Land O' Lakes Creameries and published by the Farmers Cooperative Creamery in the interests of its patrons.

LESSON VIII.

FEEDING HISTORY: Feeding cows may be divided into three periods: First, the wild hay—straw stack period; second, the timothy clover—fodder corn period; and third, the alfalfa—corn silage period, which is the present one.

When wild hay and straw is the only roughage fed cows require 1 pound of grain a day for every 2 pounds of milk produced. When a mixture of timothy and clover and fodder corn is fed 1 pound of grain will do for 3 pounds of milk. With good alfalfa hay and corn silage the grain may be reduced to 1 pound for 4 pounds of milk.

The poorer the hay, the better the grain needs to be. Ground oats, barley and corn do well enough with good alfalfa or clover, but for wild hay, timothy, or corn stalks, such grain as oilmeal, cottonseed meal, or commercial feeds high in protein are necessary for a part of the grain ration.

Good cows and good feeding should go with good co-operative creameries.

ARTHUR E. NELSON.

Arthur E. Nelon of St. Paul, who has entered the Republican primary for U. S. Senator from Minnesota, is a fine example of a country boy who taught the city folks something about their own game. Less than seven years after his arrival in St. Paul, Mr. Nelson was made the city's cheif legal counsel and two years later was elected mayor, which capacity he filled in brilliant fashion for four years. He then withdrew to engage in the practice of law which he is now doing.

Mr. Nelson was born and raised in Brown's Valley, in Western Minnesota. He is 36 years old, married and has four sons.

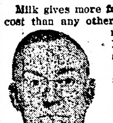
Milk Gives Most Food Value At Least Cost

Milk gives more food value for less cost than any other food known to man, according to Herbert C. Hooks, secretary of the Evaporated Milk association.



H. C. Hooks.

"Dietitians are unanimous in advocating the use of milk by men, women and children," said Mr. Hooks. "Milk and evaporated milk supply some of all the materials necessary for the growth and maintenance of the body; they furnish energy for work, play and warmth.

"Milk helps repair the wear and tear of the body. It is as good as meat for building muscle. Moreover, it is cheaper. A quart of milk will supply as much protein as seven ounces of sirloin steak or four large eggs. Milk, particularly evaporated milk, which has twice the mineral content of market milk, is one of the best and cheapest sources of lime, which is a form of calcium. Infants and growing children need lime to build bones and teeth. It is just as necessary for adults to keep their bones in good condition. One quart of milk, or one pint of evaporated milk, furnishes as much calcium as ten large oranges, thirty-two eggs or twenty pounds of beef. Milk also is a valuable source of phosphorus and supplies a certain amount of iron.

"By some authorities milk is said to be an aid in longevity. Dr. Herman Bundesen, health commissioner for Chicago, gives his prescription for long life as follows: Drink one quart of milk a day and mix with one hour of sunshine. Repeat ad infinitum.

"Due to the efforts of health officials to get across to the public the message of milk, its general use in the United States has advanced tremendously in the last decade. This is especially true of evaporated milk for reasons of its convenience and economy. Housewives know there is no fear of obtaining contaminated evaporated milk, because it is not only the best grade of market milk rendered double-rich by dehydrating, but it is sterilized as well."

Swordfish Are Cowards

A swordfish is instinctively a coward, but will put up a stiff fight when cornered. Many fishermen have lost their lives through the sinking of a dory that has had a hole jabbed in its side by these formidable fish and sometimes they even pierce a schooner's hull.

SURPRISE PARTY

Last Friday evening the neighbors of Ed Long of Golden Valley tendered him with a surprise party on his seventy-fifth birthday at his home in Mud Lake towship, where he has resided the last fifteen years.

Mr. Long has been failing in health the past year. Last winter he had an accident which injured his right leg so bad that he had to spend much of his time in bed. This together with his advanced age has handicapped him in many a way, so his neighbors decided to cheer him up a little and planned the best way to do it was thru a surprise party. A list was circulated by Harvey Dahl and Charlie Tyson and $13.30 was donated to buy him a present.

Mr. Long was more than surprised when his neighbors walked in on him with well filled baskets for a midnight lunch and presenting him with a sheepskin-lined overcoat.

Koch's Great Discovery

The first physician to discover that tuberculosis diseases were caused by the existence of bacilli was Dr. Robert Koch, a German physician and bacteriologist. In 1890 he startled the world by announcing that he had found a remedy for the "white plague," but it was found that his "lymph" in its effect on the human body was worse than the disease.

HOLT SCHOOL RECORD

Published by the Grammar Classes of the Seventh and Eighth Grades

We have now organized a new paper in the seventh and eighth grades. We are publishing this paper to serve as a record of the school life.

Johnnie Doran and Esther Hagberg were elected as editor and associate editor for this work. Various other committees were appointed from the members of the class. The committees elected were: News, Jokes, Literary, and exchange.

We hope that this venture will be a succes and that the items will be of interest to the readers.

The first grade cooperated in making a poster of the "Old Woman and her pig" a story we have just finished. The various characters in the story were drawn and colored by the children pasted on and labeled in the sequence of their appearance in the story.

The second grade plans to give a play soon in Miss Swendby's room. This is a real class project, the children are planning their costumes, finding and selecting their own speaking parts as well as directing the dramatic parts themselves. The value of this lies not in the results of the play itself but the spirit of cooperation it develops.

The sixth grade have just about finished the study of Europe and are making charts of all Europe.

The seventh and eight grades are all excited about their new paper. We all hope that some real writers and news reporters will be developed in the future.

The seventh grade history class are now studying the Making of Our Constitution. Charts are being made to trace the development of our government from the Second Continental Congress and Articles of Confederation to our present government.

The third and fourth graders have been making health book to illustrate ten or more health rules. They have also been making scrap books in which their favorite poems, pictures, sayings and jokes will be pasted.

The fourth graders have been studying Minnesota in their history class work and have started their History of Minnesota booklet

Each Friday a weekly spelling examination is given each child. This examination consists of fifty words or more. Each child receiving a passing mark is placed on the honor roll.

The skating rink appears to be very popular during the noon hour. As long as the good weather lasts it ought to be more popular. Bring your skates and have a good time and also plenty of exercise.

FOUND SOUTH SEAS NO DOMESTIC IDYL

Prospective English Countess Kept Early Hours.

London.—Housekeeping in the South Sea islands requires a great deal of hustling and energy, says Lady Hastings, who has just returned from the island of Morrea, where she went two years ago as a bride. The day begins at six o'clock, with breakfast at seven.

She is the daughter of an Italian marquis, and when she settled down in her new home she had never been in a kitchen more than a few moments at a time. Her husband, heir to the earl of Huntington, ran a plantation there.

"Our coral house in the South seas sounds so idyllic that it might be the creation of some ultraromantic imagination," said Lady Hastings.

"Such a mundane word as 'housekeeping' probably never enters one's mind in connection with it. Yet keep house I did, while my husband supervised the work outdoors."

The Hastings' had two Chinese and a Polynesian servant.

"The only difficulty about catering was that as the boat crossed from Tahiti only twice a week the commissariat had to be planned a week ahead. One boat took the orders and the next delivered them. From civilized Tahiti I ordered fresh meat on ice, New Zealand butter and canned fruits and vegetables."

Regarding the daily routine Lady Hastings said:

"In that climate, tempered by trade winds from the sea, no afternoon siesta interrupted our round of work and sailing and swimming, excepting in January and February, when the lassitude from the combined effects of heavy rain and heat had to be slept off every afternoon."

1927 "Fairly Good" for Farmers, Says Report

Washington.—Agriculture, as sized up by government experts, had a "fairly good" year in the chief producing regions with the exception of the central and eastern part of the corn and hog region.

The Department of Agriculture in its final report of the agricultural situation for the year said 1927 brought a measure of recovery to the cotton belt, but much of the central and eastern sections of the corn and hog region had a poor crop of corn, which, coupled with a slump in hog prices, left the past season a disappointing one.

"The swine industry," said the department, "was hit last spring by a market slump, especially in the European market, and continued throughout the season on a level of prices somewhat below the two previous years. The other live-stock industries have fared relatively well. All told, 1927 was a year of well-balanced production. It brought the price level of farm products last fall up near that of two years ago, which was the highest since 1920.

"The total value of about fifty crops in 1927, based on December 1 prices, is estimated at $8,428,626,000, compared to $7,793,480,000 for the same crops in 1926, an increase of $635,146,000."

West Canada Farmers Plant, 7,500,000 Trees

Indian Head, Sask., Canada.—Nearly 7,500,000 of broadleaf tree seedlings and cuttings were planted in 1927 by 11,000 prairie farmers, thus setting a new mark for tree planting in western Canada.

The development of shelter belts in the Canadian west is being followed to a considerable extent by the setting out of apple and small fruit orchards, gardens of fine vegetables and of shrubs, flower beds and lawns. To insure success in the establishment of shelter belts, helpful control is exercised by the department of interior forest service stations at Sutherland and Indian Head. From spring until the coming of winter each year a corps of field inspectors travel continuously, inspecting proposed new plantations, advising farmers and taking note of the effect of the plantations on the social and economic life of the settler.

In the last 26 years the government has distributed over 95,000,000 trees to farmers in the prairie provinces—Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Gold Nuggets in Turkey Start Search for Lode

Red Lodge, Mont.—Discovery of gold nuggets in a turkey prepared for Christmas dinner by Mrs. A. Pollard has started prospectors on a search for the mother lode.

Eight nuggets, weighing 30 grams and valued at about $3, were found in the turkey. The fowl was raised on the Paul W. Cartright ranch, two miles from Red Lodge. Red Lodge is in the district where placer miners obtained millions of dollars' worth of dust in pioneer western days.

MOON RAISES HIGHER TIDES THAN THE SUN

Distance Is Chief Factor in Reducing Sol's Pull.

Washington.—"Although the moon is the chief factor in creating tides, the sun also makes itself felt noticeably in piling up the ocean's waters," says a bulletin from the Washington headquarters of the National Geographic society.

"But the sun is tremendously greater than the moon—more than 27,000,000 times as large; why does it play a subordinate part to the little moon in tide production?

"Distance is one answer, but it is not the whole answer. If the sun were as close to the earth as the moon is it would pull the earth and its waters some 27,000,000 times as hard as the moon does. But since distance is such a great reducer of gravitation the sun's pull on the earth is roughly only 183 times that of the moon.

"But the question persists, why does the moon produce the higher tides when the sun pulls on the earth 183 times as strongly?

"The total pull of a body on another, and its tide-producing force are not the same. The tide on the earth results from the difference between the pulls on the center of the earth and on the near and far sides. These are the pulls that tend to separate the waters and the earth, and therefore to pile the waters up. And it will be seen on close thought that two weak forces that are considerably different, operating one on the earth and one on the waters, can cause a greater separation than two very strong forces that are nearly equal.

Weakened by Distance.

"Light and gravitation act somewhat alike in that each grows weaker as the source of light or gravitational pull is moved farther and farther away, and that both grow weaker very rapidly—in proportion to the distance of the source multiplied by itself. The differences in gravitational pull on which tides depend can be visualized, therefore, by an experiment with light.

"Turn on an electric desk light or other single bulb and hold near it a sheet of ordinary white paper. Hold the paper with one edge toward the light and only two or three inches away and turn it very slightly so that the light shines along the sheet and illuminates its whole surface. There will be a noticeable difference between the brightness of the light at a point near the close edge and at a point near the far edge.

"Now hold the paper in the same way at a distance of ten or twelve feet from an even brighter light, or hold it in the daytime at such a distance from a bright window. You know that there is still a difference in the degree of illumination of the two sides, but it is so very tiny that you cannot detect it.

"The two points on which the sun pulls to make the near tide—the surface of the ocean nearest the moon and the earth's center—are 4,000 miles apart, and this 4,000 miles is a tiny fraction of the earth-sun distance, a little over four-one hundred thousandths. In the case of the moon this same 4,000 miles is a relatively large fraction of the earth-moon distance—1,666 one hundred thousandths.

"When all the values for distance and mass are inserted in the rather formidable equations for the pulls of the moon at the center of the earth and at the surface, and for the pulls of the sun at these two points, it works out that the difference in the moon's pulls are roughly 2¼ times the difference in the sun's pulls. The moon, therefore, exerts 2¼ times the tide-producing power exerted by the sun.

What Makes Highest Tides.

"Most of the time the sun and moon are pulling in different directions. But twice each month they pull in the same line. It is then that our coasts have their highest tides.

"Theoretically every star and planet and satellite in the universe raises its separate tide in our oceans. Actually, however, even Jupiter, the greatest of our sister planets, is so far away and relatively so small, that its influence cannot be detected. To all intents, therefore, it may be said that only the moon and the sun, our nearest and our most powerful neighbors in space, have a share in making the earth's tides."

Young Frenchmen Are Found Unfit for Army

Paris.—More than half the young Frenchmen called to do their 18 months' government military service are found unfit. The proportion of rejected men has been growing each year since the war.

Before the war, when the young conscripts did three and even four years' service in the army, only about one man in ten was relieved of duty. Many of these, examined later, were accepted for office duty.

About one-third of the young men are refused as physically below par when they appear at the age of twenty. About a sixth are sent home during their first three months' service, the hard life of the army and the manual labor or exercise developing defects previously undetected.

GRIEF OF MOTHER STARTS INDUSTRY

Takes Up Weaving and Town Is Now Famous.

Beiriz, Portugal.—A broken-hearted mother is responsible for bringing an entirely new industry to this remote village of the Douro province.

Four years ago the young wife of a well-to-do farmer here lost her only child. To take her thoughts away from her grief she took up carpet-making. Her nimble fingers worked so fast in their race to keep ahead of her sad thoughts that she became quite proficient and finally took on six apprentices to help her.

The carpets they produced were so successful that the industry expanded and their little home workshop has become a factory with 300 women employees, besides scores of others employed in minor jobs and training for admission in a second factory which will open soon.

The harmonious, delicate coloring and the intricate patterns of the Beiriz carpets already has made them well known in other countries.

The wool used in their fabrication is obtained from the flocks of the Portuguese Serras. All raw material is Portuguese, so that the industry is a genuinely national one.

The carpet industry is bringing prosperity to districts surrounding Beiriz. The women who a few years ago worked all day in the fields with their menfolk for a precarious livelihood now live in comfort at home employed in weaving and spinning the wool for the carpets at the factories, which sell as fast as they are made.

Grandmother Proud of Work in Night School

Brooklyn, N. Y.—Mrs. Mollie Kaplan could not understand what the fuss was about, and her dark eyes snapped with mystification and a trace of anger. She was a grandmother, yes, with 13 grandchildren, and she was probably the only grandmother, sixty years old, attending the public evening schools in the city of New York. What of it?

"Me? Too old? Why, I learn just as well as when I was younger," she said. To prove it, she drew forth a black notebook and showed the long English words she had written there.

Mrs. Kaplan came to American from Poland about a year ago. First of all, she says, she went to the synagogue and after a while she sought out a public school. She has never seen a moving picture, but she may, sometime.

According to Ignus O. Hornstein, principal of evening school 150, and Miss Clara Komoroff, Mrs. Kaplan's teacher, there is no more conscientious student in the evening school than the grandmother who three nights a week trudges up three flights of stairs and seats herself up in the front row of the classroom, pencil in hand and notebook in readiness.

Wives' Modernity Still Wins French Divorces

Paris.—Modern woman's mannishness has not yet swept all Frenchmen off their feet.

In Paris a merchant charged his wife with "cutting her hair like a boy, smoking like a chimney and driving like a chauffeur," and convinced the divorce court that he was right to object.

At Montbrison one of the old school got a divorce because his wife, who enjoyed riding a motor cycle astride, clothed in "baggy breeches," refused to cease these practices, which "injured his standing as an insurance agent. He took the precaution of having officials serve a summons on her to get her back into skirts and to establish that she refused to do so.

Legion of Honor Is Expensive to France

Paris.—Every red ribbon of the Legion of Honor costs the French government 500 francs, or $20, a year.

There are about 120,000 members of the order, so the expense runs above 60,000,000 francs.

Every member pays for his insignia, but there are archives and records to be kept, a permanent governing body to be maintained and several schools to be operated for children of members.

Pensions are attached to only a small proportion of the honors conferred for distinguished service, and each year there are fewer such awards.

Shaw's "Double" Is Soap-Box Orator

London. — George Bernard Shaw has a double who is a soap-box orator.

For some months before Shaw moved from Adelphi terrace to Whitehall court the tall, gray-bearded man who so greatly resembles the famous novelist was frequently seen in the vicinity of Shaw's flat on the Thames embankment. Now he has appeared near Whitehall court, often mounting his street-corner rostrum to address men and women who think they are listening to Bernard Shaw himself.

Lloyd George has several doubles in London, as have even the prince of Wales and Queen Mary.

Reaction of Animals to Strains of Music

Zoologists and ornithologists long have studied the effect of music on beast and bird and the net result of their investigations is that the only crawling thing that will bite the band that plays to it is the rhinoceros. It will charge with intent to kill any saxophone player, any trumpeter, any violinist. It will chew into splinters any radio set that thus transmits. So recently declared E. G. Boulenger, director of the Zoological Society aquarium of London, where elaborate music tests on animals were made.

More domesticated beasts such as the dog and cat are reported to be quite amenable to the charms of radio concerts. And the canary bird actually improves his song box through constant suggestion, and subsequent effort at imitation.

Scorpions, spiders, crocodiles, wolves and jackals all have a distinct penchant for syncopation and become docile and even supine, it is reported.

Vanadium Once a "Cure"

That vanadium, today an element essential to the manufacture of steel, was once considered to have value only as a "medicine" is revealed by a writer in the Boston News Bureau. At one time, according to this writer, it was considered a cure for many kinds of ills. The Flannigans of Pittsburgh then controlled vanadium. They believed it contained valuable chemical properties. A quarter of a century or so ago they erected a big sanitarium in Cambridge Springs, Pa., at a cost of $500,000 or more. It was well patronized for a time, but the building was sold many years ago, and is now used for other purposes.

Awful Threat!

Betty and her mother had been quarreling.

"Boo, hoo!" Betty cried finally, "if you treat me like this, mother, I'll go home to hubby!"

The BABY

Why do so many, many babies of today escape all the little fretful spells and infantile ailments that used to worry mothers through the day, and keep them up half the night?

If you don't know the answer, you haven't discovered pure, harmless Castoria. It is sweet to the taste, and sweet in the little stomach. And its gentle influence seems felt all through the tiny system. Not even a distasteful dose of castor oil does so much good.

Fletcher's Castoria is purely vegetable, so you may give it freely, at first sign of colic; or constipation; or diarrhea. Or those many times when you just don't know what is the matter. For real sickness, call the doctor, always. At other times, a few drops of Fletcher's Castoria.

The doctor often tells you to do just that; and always says Fletcher's. Other preparations may be just as pure, just as free from dangerous drugs, but why experiment? Besides the book on care and feeding of babies that comes with Fletcher's Castoria is worth its weight in gold!

STORY FROM THE START

Handsome, fastidious and wealthy—young St. Croix Creighton awaits his sweetheart at their trysting place. She is late, this ordinary little Pennsylvania Dutch girl, Meely Schwenckton. Despite her seeming innocence and ignorance, she succeeds in keeping him at a distance, to his chagrin. Meely, in the Schwenckton home, where she is boarding, is altogether unlike the girl who meets St. Croix clandestinely. She is the teacher in the neighborhood school, of which Marvin Creighton, St. Croix' brother, is superintendent. Meely learns that Marvin was to have married his cousin, a titled English lady, but, believing she was attracted by the Creighton wealth, had refused the alliance. It is the rumor that St. Croix is to take Marvin's place and marry the English girl. St. Croix' jealousy is aroused by Meely's report of an aged suitor for her hand. The girl cleverly decoys him into admitting he has no intention of marrying her.

Ever since Mr. Schwenckton had warned her that the superintendent would be visiting her school, she had gone cautiously; had been ready, at an instant's warning, to have the children suddenly busy at the blackboard "doing tables" or something like that. But as ill luck would have it, it was on the very afternoon of his visit that she had become so entrancingly engrossed in her wide departure from "prescribed branches" that she never heard his knock on the schoolroom door, never saw him enter!—and God only knew how long he had been standing there watching her wild performance, when suddenly the faces of the children warned her. Her back was toward the door at the moment, but she did not have to turn to know he was standing there! Horror of horrors! That he should have caught her at such a moment as this, after all her precautions! She was so stunned with embarrassment she could not have turned around if her life had been the forfeit for not doing so!

Pretending to be unaware of his presence, she moved stiffly to the edge of the platform and spoke faintly, directing the several grades to the orthodox blackboard or tablet work with which she had planned to propitiate him on his visit—though she knew she was just several minutes too late, now, to deceive him. She'd been caught red-handed—oh, oh!

Seating herself at her desk, her back still toward him, she awaited his approach. But he did not come. A hope leapt up in her heart that she had been mistaken. But she was still too terrified to look around.

A step on the platform just back of her chair—and she barely suppressed a shriek.

He stood before her, hat and gloves in one hand, the other held out to her.

Blindly she rose and gave him her own, not daring to look up and meet his eye.

As she did not invite him to be seated, he had to take care of himself. "With your permission?" he said as he drew a chair forward and, motioning her to be reseated, sat down at her side—and she realized with fresh embarrassment her remissness in schoolroom hospitality.

Laying his hat and gloves on the desk, he leaned back comfortably, as though settling himself to stay a while, folded his arms and—waited.

Heavens!—what was she expected to do? Perform pedagogically for his inspection, no doubt. Well, she couldn't; she wouldn't try! But just to sit here— Ought she converse with him, entertain him? She stole a swift side glance at him. His eyes were thoughtfully contemplating the schoolroom. She might pretend ignorance of who he was; take him for a parent visiting the school.

But her protracted silence seemed to give him an idea. "Perhaps I must introduce myself? Mr. Creighton, your superintendent."

"Well, I cannot tell a lie and say I'm glad to see you!" she hysterically brought out, "for I'm not!"

He grinned. They all hated his visits, the county teachers, but they did not, as a general thing, frankly shriek at him! On the contrary! Palavered over him, flattered him, pretended to be pleased to death to see him.

"Why?" he asked. "Got a guilty conscience?"

She repressed a start. A guilty conscience she certainly did have and with good reason. But he could not know that reason. What a cultivated voice he had—like St. Croix'—but with a grave thoughtfulness in his tone that interested her. She took a bit of comfort from the twinkle in his eyes. His difference from St. Croix was conspicuous enough—here was no air of superiority, no self-consciousness; but an offhand directness which took it for granted that he was on your level, rather than that he accepted you on his. He impressed her on sight as being genuine.

"I can't teach before you!" she exclaimed, as though accusing him of our famous American "moral turpitude." "I just can't and that's all there is about it!" (She made an effort to pronounce her a's as in air rather than as in art, as her natural speech, she knew, would seem highly unnatural for a Kutztown Normal school graduate and a teacher in this vicinity.)

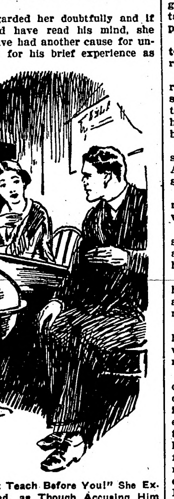
"But—" He turned in his chair and faced her. Such an unprofessional mien as this he had not encountered in any schoolroom of the county. "I understand, Miss Schwenckton, that you are a graduate of Kutztown Normal school. Then you ought to know a lot more about this business of teaching than I do! I'm not a Kutztown Normal graduate."

She had nothing to answer. She almost hung her head, furious at her helpless stupidity; St. Croix had never put her to such confusion—

"You are a normal school graduate, aren't you?"

She slightly nodded. She had never in the least minded telling lies to St. Croix.

He regarded her doubtfully and if she could have read his mind, she would have had another cause for uneasiness; for his brief experience as county superintendent had taught him that what normal school graduates did not know about pedagogy was negligible; their superiority and their awareness of it, their poise, their condescending pity toward the unfortunate teachers who were not normal school graduates, he had found a little oppressive. Meely did not know it, but she was behaving more like the frightened, uncertain nongraduates that were mere certificate holders who had managed to pass the county superintendent's examination than like the self-confident Kutztown graduates who were not required to take that examination.



"I Can't Teach Before You!" She Exclaimed, as Though Accusing Him of Our Famous American "Moral Turpitude."

He sat back again and folded his arms with an air of determination. "I'm here to hear you teach," he said firmly. "Please call a class and teach!"

"You teach them something," she brightly suggested. "Oh!" she exclaimed hopefully, "don't you want to make a speech to them?" (She knew how men loved making speeches; loved the sound of their own voices before an audience.)

"That's not what I'm here for," he returned. "I don't want to interrupt your program—what were you doing when I came in? Proceed with that."

"I—I can't!"

"But I only want to see you in your usual routine—"

"I—I was breaking the usual routine—"

"From what I observed as I entered, I must say I'm glad it was only a breaking of the usual routine! Now, will you call a class in—er—geography, we'll say?"

"You'd laugh at me."

"But look here! Will you tell me what you do here all day if you don't teach?"

"Oh, I do teach—of kaws—courrse I teach! But you see"—she suddenly picked up courage and launched forth—"I have my own original way of teaching—and if you're the conventional school man, originality would be highly offensive to you."

"Now you make me very curious! Let's have a sample of this originality!"

"You see, I hold that children should be taught," she discoursed airily, adopting somewhat the tone of a platform lecturer, "what is for their immediate use and pleasure, rather than for the future, for only so will they grow. You don't grow by what you store up, but by what you use and assimilate. So I—"

"Wait! Is this your own, or recited from some textbook of modern pedagogy?"

"Entirely my own that I've forged out for myself—though others may also have forged it out—that I can't say. The goal which I set before my pupils is not marks and grades, but knowledge."

"Excellent! Knowledge of what, for instance?"

"Of whatever interests them. They're not much interested in arithmetic and grammar and spelling. You can interest them in science, history, geography (geography only when taught entertainingly, as I teach it), poetry, stories, plays—"

"Sounds so good, I think I'll come to school to you! Do call up a geography class."

"I don't know so much about geography, really—do you know," she smiled, "until quite recently I thought the North and South of the Civil war here in the United States were divided by the Mississippi river! I—"

She stopped short in dismay—now she had given herself away! No American on earth had ever supposed such a thing as that!

"My sense of direction," she murmured with a nervous laugh, "was always weak! I—"

No use—you couldn't explain away such lunacy. Might as well keep quiet and let him draw what conclusions he would.

He made no comment. He had given her one swift, penetrating glance; but at her obviously painful embarrassment had mercifully looked away.

"Kindly call up a geography class," he urged after a moment, in a tone which, though courteous, was a command.

"I'd rather not, if you'll kindly excuse me. The one thing these children seem to need," she said, reverting to her lecture-platform tone in her effort to divert him from his yearning to hear her teach geography, "is to have their imaginations roused. Before I came they didn't know the commonest, most familiar stories—Cinderella, Jack, the Giant Killer, Arabian Nights. Imagine American children so benighted! Those children knew all the multiplication tables and all the capitals of the 37 states—"

"Forty-seven."

"I mean forty-seven, of kaws—courrse—though strict accuracy in unimportant details always did strike me as rather a fault than a virtue in a teacher, for a good teacher should have a mind above insignificant facts—"

"Ten of these United States is not an 'insignificant fact,' exactly. I'm afraid I must insist, Miss Schwenckton, upon your calling a geography class. Everything you say makes me more and more eager every minute to hear you teach a class in the geography of the United States."

"I'm sorry not to oblige you, Mr. Creighton. I'll be very glad to allow you to examine the blackboard work—you'll find it quite creditable—"

"But this, Miss Schwenckton, is insubordination! Remember I'm your superior officer!"

Took Roundabout Trip to Escape Pursuers

One of the unnamed heroes of the South in the Civil war staged an unusual exploit that is still one of the most interesting traditions of Mobile bay. While the federal fleet lay off Fort Morgan, this Southern sailor, out in a small sailboat, was chased by some of the enemy boats. Seeing them trying to intercept him he used all his sail power and nautical skill and headed eastward. For miles the chase continued and he left his pursuers behind. However, he knew they would be watching for him to return, so he kept on to the east, sailing to Appalachicola, Fla., where he loaded his craft on a river steamer and made a trip of several days up the Chattahoochee to Columbus, Ga. There he transferred to a train for Opelika, then to Montgomery, Ala. At that point he changed cars for Hurricane, Ala., taking his boat along, and at Hurricane he launched his craft in the Tensaw river. He sailed down the river to Mobile bay and then down the bay some 30 miles to Fort Morgan. His comrades were dumbfounded when they saw him arrive from a direction opposite to that in which he had left.—Detroit News.

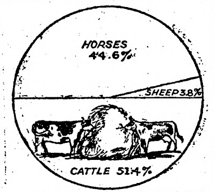
Hay Cafeteria Service



(Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation)

Our hay crop furnishes one of the largest cafeteria services in existence, according to the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation. Seventy-eight million tons, it is expected, will be produced in 1926, a large part of which will be consumed by cattle. According to figures put out by the Department of Agriculture, 51.4% of this amount will be eaten by cattle, 44.6% by horses and the remaining 3.8% by sheep. The amount of hay eaten by hogs is very slight, only a small fraction of one per cent of the alfalfa crop. As in the case of other feed crops, most of this hay is consumed right on the farm where it is grown.

SHORT LESSONS IN DAIRYING

A series of 52 articles by Land O' Lakes Creameries and published by the Farmers Cooperative Creamery in the interests of its patrons.

LESSON IX.

BE COMFORTABLE: A clean, warm, well lighted, well ventilated and convenient dairy barn is a most comfortable place to work during the winter months: Under such conditions dairy work, and especially with good cows, becomes a pleasure rather than drudgery. They who find pleasure in their work are blessed.

To make dairying profitable is of first importance, but to make the work agreeable so they who do the work shall be happy is equally important. When all conditions are right, such as feed, conveniences and care, happiness is reflected from the cows and calves as well as from the workers.

A desirable barn requires much study and planning. It is well to visit successful dairy farms for new ideas and comparison. Plans of dairy barns for study may be secured from lumber dealers and from the Bulliten Department of the State and Government. Address Bulliten Department, University Farm, St. Paul, and Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

CANDY SPECIAL TRAIN IS LATEST THING DE LUXE IN TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY TRANSPORTATION

St. Paul, Minn.—And now comes the "Candy Special", handling sweet-tooth goodies across the continent that none of the freshness of high grade confectionery will be lost enroute from factory to the consumer. The chocolate bar thus enters the class with precious silk, in railway consignment at least.

The "Baby Ruth" bar enjoys the distinction of being the first exclusive traveler de luxe in the candy family, for the Great Northern special carrying 195 tons of "individually attired tinfoiled bars," which recently pulled out of Chicago destined to deliver this fast freight to Pacific Coast cities, marked the first step in the history of railway transportation that candy has been moved in specal train load lots.

This special train transporting 2,505,000 of the Curtis Company's candy bars will distribute car load lots in Spokane, Tacoma, Seattle and Portland. It was one of the largest single shipments of confectionery ever moved out of Chicago. The Curtis Candy Company's officials figured that if placed end to end the confectionery on this special train would make a giant "Baby Ruth" candy bar 158 miles long, weighing about 390,000 pounds. In all 32 special train loads of Curtis candy are being moved to various cities of the United States this spring, according to Otto Y. Schnering, president, who says this volume is an innovation in the candy business of the United States.

THE HOLT SCHOOL RECORD

Published by the Seventh and Eighth Grades

THIS is the second issue of the paper as prepared by members of the grammar classes. We hope you will enjoy hearing about the work this school is doing as much as we enjoy telling you about it.

The other day a pupil was running up the steps and fell when he reached the top. Whether or not he was hurt is not the question. Halls and stairways are not made for that purpose. Watch your step would be a good rule to follow in this case. You can't expect our teachers to teach us how to walk properly.

The first and second grades are making a dictionary. They are going to bring pictures to illustrate the words.

The fifth and sixth grades have been drawing vases and have painted a few of them. Some real artistic work has been turned out.

Current Events Race

The seventh and eighth grade current events race is drawing to a close. Next week's recitation will decide the winners. Two cars have been started across a map of the U. S. and the car which reaches San Francisco first will be the winner. One point is given for an intelligent report, two points if outside information is brot regarding the topic, and three points if a picture is shown to illustrate the topic.

Jokes

Teacher: "Robert, here is an example in subtraction. Seven boys went down to the creek to bathe, but two of them had been told to stay out of the water. How many went in?"
Robert: "Seven."

"Father, what branches did you take when you went to school?"

"Son, I never went to high school, but when I went to the little old log schoolhouse they used hickory, willow, and beech."

Teacher: "Correct the sentence 'It was me who spilt the ink.' "

Pupil: " 'It wasn't me who spilt the ink.' "

Exchange

It seems the way pupils are running up and down the stairs that they believe in the old adage: "Three steps at a time saves nine."

Some people have tact and others tell the truth. To which class do you belong?

Attended Ditch Hearing Wed

A number of farmers and business men from here motored to Warren on Wednesday to attend the County Commissioners' meeting. It was at this meeting that the decision was to be made as to whether or not the farmers here were to get the ditch they petitioned for. Details of the outcome will be given next week.

Holt Defeated

The Holt Basketball team, with a truckload of rooters, motored to Newfolden on Friday evening for a return game with that aggregation. The locals were defeated in a fast game which ended with the long end of a 12—19 score going to Newfolden.

We were informed that the big crabby fellow is still on the Newfolden team. They will play the locals again soon.

STORY FROM THE START

Handsome, fastidious and wealthy—young St. Croix Creighton awaits his sweetheart at their trysting place. She is late, this ordinary little Pennsylvania Dutch girl, Meely Schwenckton. Despite her seeming innocence and ignorance, she succeeds in keeping him at a distance, to his chagrin. Meely, in the Schwenckton home, where she is boarding, is altogether unlike the girl who meets St. Croix clandestinely. She is the teacher in the neighborhood school, of which Marvin Creighton, St. Croix' brother, is superintendent. Meely learns that Marvin was to have married his cousin, a titled English lady, but, believing she was attracted by the Creighton wealth, had refused the alliance. It is the rumor that St. Croix is to take Marvin's place and marry the English girl. St. Croix' jealousy is aroused by Meely's report of an aged suitor for her hand. The girl cleverly decoys him into admitting he has no intention of marrying her. Marvin visits school in his official capacity as superintendent.

—9—

"But, you see, we modern teachers, we normal school graduates, do not believe in co-uh-cion and fawce. In my government of this school, for instance, I try to have all co-urr-sion come from within, not from without."

"Fine; if you can work it; can you? And this idea of yours—teaching children 'what is for their immediate use' (and 'pleasure,' I believe you added?) is it for their physical or mental growth that you are striving?—for what I saw as I came in here appeared to be violent gymnastics or an execution of the charleston!"

"I was acting out a play for them—Barrie's 'A Kiss for Cinderella.' I was at the ball—"

"Um-mm," he murmured. "Acting?"

"Trying to."

"But you'll have these sectarian parents on your back! The 'plain' people, you know, are horrified at the word 'acting.'"

"But I act everything I teach—history, spelling, grammar—it's the only way I can teach."

"Now, do you know I would like to see you act spelling!"

"Well, you won't get a chance to!"

"Look here! Don't you know what a county superintendent is?"

"Oh, don't I? 'To you your superintendent should be as a god; one to whom you are but as form in wax, within his power to leave the figure or disfigure it,'" she dramatically recited a passage from "Midsummer Night's Dream," slightly adapted.

"Very well, then, how dare you cheek me and say you won't when I tell you to do a thing?"

"Because I'd rather lose my job than have you sit there and laugh at me!"

"It's not for a mere superintendent," he shook his head humbly, "to laugh at a normal school graduate!—though I'm sure, Miss Schwenckton, that the normal school course does not include histrionics! I do know that much about normal schools! However, I congratulate you."

"On my—intelligent ideas about teaching?"

"On your excellent acting."

She stiffened with alarm. "But—but you've not seen it!" she objected.

"You're sure? By the way—what role were you going to play when I passed you on the road the other day dolled up like a comic valentine?"

She caught her breath. "But—but you never looked at me! Do you see with your left ear?"

He laughed, rose abruptly, and held out his hand. "Good-by, Miss"—his eyes bored into hers like gimlets—"Schwenckton; I won't torture you any longer with my unwelcome presence!"

"Good-by," she sighed with deep relief.

"But—a few questions before I go, if you don't mind." He took out a pencil and notebook. "Your class at Kutztown normal?"

She could not answer that question offhand, apparently. "Wait a minute." She opened a drawer of her desk, took out her diploma and handed it to him. She had been prudently keeping this diploma at hand to be ready at need when he should call.

"Um-mm," he said thoughtfully, "two years ago. You didn't teach last year?"

"No-no."

"Why not?"

"Well—I was going to be married—but, strange as it may seem to you, I got jilted."

He caught his lower lip between his teeth and stared at her. Then, with an abrupt nod, turned away and left the schoolroom.

"My G—d!" she thought, her hand pressed to her heart, "how much does he suspect?"

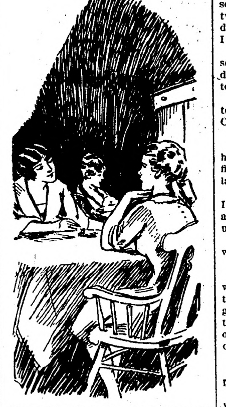
It was, of course, her accent that betrayed her. She could perfectly disguise it when she adopted the extreme Pennsylvania Dutch dialect, but nothing short of that could hide the foreign touch of her speech.

She could only hope that her possession of this Kutztown normal diploma would throw him off the scent.

* * *

All the Schwencktons, except the ailing wife and baby, were very tired of Aunt Rosy and longed for Susie's recovery not only for her own sake, but because it would rid them of the older woman's unpleasant company. Meely and Mr. Schwenckton both loathed her uncleanliness; Meely feared her spying upon her; Sammy hated and resented her; Lizzie was afraid of her cold-blooded spite for the humiliating defeat the child had caused her; and Mr. Schwenckton was impatient to be rid of her so that he could bring home his daughter Nettie.

And at last, in spite of unsanitary conditions, and through the occasional conniving of Meely and the doctor to outwit Aunt Rosy and Mr. Schwenckton and air the house, Susie began to rally and the baby to pick up; and a week after they were brought down from the stuffy bedroom to the less confined atmosphere of the kitchen, Susie was almost as strong and blooming as she had ever been and the baby began to get fat.



"But Nettie," Meely Felt Urged to Warn the Child, "a Man in Mr. Creighton's Position Would Never Marry a Girl in Your—in Our Place in Life."

Aunt Rosy was so reluctant to leave that Meely would have suspected her of having purposely prolonged Susie's convalescence by her bad care of her had it not been manifest that these two sisters were really very fond of each other.

It was a peculiar attachment, for Susie seemed phlegmatically indifferent to everyone else, even to her baby, and certainly to her elderly husband. Meely thought she had never met anyone so stolid; so incapable of being stirred by anything.

This stolidity seemed more marked than ever in contrast with the adolescent vividness of her stepdaughter, Nettie, who, on the very day of Aunt Rosy's departure, was brought home from her grandmother's by her father; a young girl in her early teens, with a pretty, though plebeian face, whose awakening nature was making her avidly curious about life. She worried Susie with questions to such an extent that the older woman, not accustomed to using her brains, found the girl's challenging curiosity exhausting to the point of pain.

One evening Mr. Schwenckton's absence from home (he had gone on a business trip to town) gave Nettie an unwonted opportunity, for her father's presence was a check upon the intimate questions she loved to ask. Lizzie and Sammy had gone to bed; Meely, in a bathrobe, with her hair in a heavy braid down her back, was sitting at the kitchen table writing letters; Susie was rocking her baby before the kitchen stove; and Nettie was stretched at full length on the settee facing her pretty and ridiculously young stepmother.

"Say Susie, why did you marry Pop?" asked Nettie.

"Ach—because."

"But why? Tell me! G'on."

"Ach, well, because I did."

"Ach, Susie, you must o' had some reason."

"Ach, well, a body has to marry somebody."

"Why must you marry somebody?"

"Well—if you don't want to be an old maid."

"Wouldn't you sooner be an old maid than married to Pop? I would! You couldn't o' been in love with Pop," said Nettie reflectively.

"Nettie Schwenckton, I do believe you think love is like in them movies! My sakes! That's only in them movies, Nettie. It ain't no such a thing for really!"

"But it is, too. I felt it myself a'ready!"

"Ach, you just think you felt it because you seen so many of them movies whiles you was in town there with your gramma. But it ain't no such a thing for really. You only gotta look around you a little to see for yourself it ain't no such a thing."

"I won't get married," exclaimed Nettie, "unless I can meet up with such a fellah like Rudolph Valentino or Tom Mix or whoever! I wisht," she sighed longingly, "I could run into Mr. St. Croix Creighton—"

Meely looked up from her letters and watched the girl's childish, pretty face whose commonness was almost obliterated by the soft, dreamy ecstasy that lit up her vivid youth. "I seen Mr. St. Croix Creighton oncet or twicet or so. Gee, he's some swell dresser! And ain't he a good looker! I wisht I could meet up with him!"

Though this longing of Nettie's seemed as far as possible from immediate realization, that very night was to see it fulfilled.

"Say, Meely," Nettie appealed to the teacher, "did you ever see Mr. St. Croix Creighton?"

"I—I think I did."

"You'd know it if you did! Gee, he's got the style to him! That," affirmed Nettie, "is the only kind of fellah can have me!"

Susie sniffed. "You hate yourself—I don't think! What makes you s'pose a high-stepper like him would take up with you yet? Good lands!"

"They do in the movies sometimes—when they fall good in love."

"Yes, in them movies," Susie scoffed.

"But, Nettie," Meely felt urged to warn the child, "a man in Mr. Creighton's position would never marry a girl in your—in our—place in life. So that your 'meeting up with him' would only mean unhappiness for you—especially if he fell in love with you."

"But in them movies—"

"Ach, them movies!" Susie interpolated.

"All right, then!" retorted Nettie with sudden passion, "I'd sooner live three weeks with a swell gen'leman that I could admar, than be respectable all my life with a old man like Pop! And I'd think more of myself for doin' it, too!"

"Well, Nettie Schwenckton, if you aint!" said Susie, only mildly scandalized; nothing could ever really rouse her to any show of feeling.

"Nettie," Meely experimentally remarked, "you know there's Mr. Marvin Creighton over at Absalom Puntz'—there'd be some chance of your meeting him—and none at all, I should think, of your running into St.—Mr. St. Croix Creighton—"

"Ach, that there county superintendent, he's a stiff! I often seen him a'ready and he didn't gimme no romantic feelings. He ain't nothin' like them movie actors—"

The sound of steps on the kitchen porch interrupted her.

"Pop's back a'ready," she said, with a glance at the clock whose hands pointed to ten. "He won't like it we're up so late."

She rose, yawned, and stretching wide her arms, revealed a beautifully developing young figure.

Meely, looking at her, wondered whether, in case the girl's longing to meet St. Croix were ever realized, he would not find her even more irresistible than he was finding "Meely Schwenckton."

Toys Thought Wonders

Less than 200 years ago, three quite ordinary mechanical toys attracted great attention when they were exhibited. One was a figure that played the flute, another a tambourine player, and the third a swimming duck.

Lifelike canaries that sing naturally when they are wound up are commonplace toys nowadays. The first of this type of toy was shown at the great exhibition of 1851 in England.

Need Law's Restraint

Bulk Grain Handling Benefit to Farmers

By handling grain in bulk instead of sacks, wheat growers of the Pacific coast, it is authoritatively stated, are saving approximately 10 cents a bushel in operating costs.

Sacked wheat has disappeared almost entirely from export channels at Portland, and bulk handling is rapidly gaining favor in Seattle.

Abandonment of the sack method was advocated by federal market experts when freight rates West were materially reduced by the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific railways, which carry export wheat from the interior to Vancouver.

Able to place their grain in Pacific ports at a much lower cost, Canadian farmers were in position to take the foreign market almost entirely away from American growers unless economic strategy made it possible for them to offer their wheat at a corresponding price.

By discarding the sack method for bulk shipping, says E. N. Bates, investigator for the federal bureau of agricultural economics, harvesting and handling as well as marketing costs are reduced.

"The farmer," he explains, "is relieved of the yearly sacks and twine bill. High-priced labor for sewing and handling the sacks is eliminated. Grain in bulk can be cleaned and conditioned in the country, saving freight on dockage and enabling the farmer to put on the market a higher grade

Honest Jane and Banknotes

By SYBIL GRAY

(Copyright.)

JANE BAIRD, very, very far from home—her home being in the Middle West—was standing at the banking department of the American Express company in London cashing almost the last check in her book.

Jane was a hard hard-working schoolteacher and had saved all through the winter months in order to go on a wild burst of travel and see a bit more of the world than her own immediate vicinity. She had burst open the purse strings with an extravagant gesture and payed for one of those well-advertised and wonderfully enjoyable cheap trips to Europe. And every minute had been a joy.

And now as she pushed her check across the wide counter and waited for her English money, which she had not got very familiar with, she stooped and picked up a few white papers that lay on the floor at her feet. She thrust them in her bag so that anyone watching her would think she had dropped them. Jane didn't want anyone to think her so curious about papers lying on the floor because she had been the recipient of much chaff about this habit of hers. She could hardly pass a bit of paper on the street without giving it a poke with her umbrella to see what it might be.

Having got her money from the clerk she turned and sat down at one of the many desks provided for the use of American travelers and had a look at the papers she had picked up.

"Oh," she gasped. "It's money. Some one has lost all this. Five twenty-pound notes! Imagine anyone having so much change and dropping it about like that. Let's see—that is five hundred dollars in American money. Wouldn't I like to go out into Regent street and spend a lot of it on clothes!" Jane looked forlornly down at her well-worn suit but got up from the desk and went over to the clerk at the banking department.

"I picked this up on the floor," she said.

"Oh, I say, Miss Baird, that was a find. I've no doubt the person who lost it will give you a reward. I'll take down your present address and if no one claims it I will let you know."

A day or two later she called in at the office to ask if anyone had come for the lost bank notes and was handed an envelope which she opened while the interested clerk looked on.

There was slight disappointment in Jane's face as she read the brief letter but a smile, too, played about her mouth.

"The old gentleman who lost that money wants to take me out to dinner," she confided with American frankness to the clerk. "What does he—a—look like? Do you think I should go?"

"Certainly," laughed the clerk, "thorough gentleman is Mr. Ludlow. He has pots and pots of money so you may be in for a reward."

Jane went back to her hotel but stopped at the lovely new windows of Swan and Edgar and saw therein a beautiful frock that seemed to beckon her inside the shop. She figured swiftly, her head cocked to one side, then went in.

"I hadn't a single dud to go to dinner with anyone in," she told her thrifty conscience.

Next evening it was a particularly charming Jane who went down to meet the old gentleman—Mr. Ludlow—whose invitation she had accepted. He had said in his letter that he would bring another lady along so that she had not hesitated to meet him.

The gentleman who rose to greet her was not old and he was extremely good to look at.

"Miss Baird—please forgive my telling you I was an old gentleman. I was afraid you wouldn't come if I didn't resort to subterfuge. Mother," he said, and introduced Jane to the little lady who had sat so quietly amused at the unusual position her son had brought about.

"It was very sweet of you to come, Miss Baird. As a matter of fact, my son and I have been just a wee bit lonesome here in London. We're all the way from Denver."

"Mother, I'll hop off and get seats for a show while you two get a bit acquainted and look up some place for dinner," said the son, and, not waiting for any argument, he was off.

"Do you know," confided Mrs. Ludlow, "I am truly glad to meet you—you don't know how many girls are hanging about that boy of mine simply because he has money—it's about all some girls think of."

"I have to think of it most of the time," laughed Jane. "My small amount gives me more trouble than if I had a lot. I just have about enough to limp home on—but I've had one grand and glorious time spending the little I had."

Mrs. Ludlow smiled knowingly. She knew, without being told, that her son would in the near future, give this lovely and honest young lady all that she wanted of travel. And for once she was glad that her boy was somewhat careless about dropping banknotes.

SHE WENT FROM BAD TO WORSE

Down to 98 Pounds—Finally Restored to Health by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Cleveland, Ohio.—"After having my first baby, I lost weight, no matter what I did. Then a doctor told me I would be better if I had another baby, which I did. But I got worse, was always sickly and went down to 98 pounds. My neighbor told me about Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, as it helped her very much, so I tried it. After taking four bottles, I weigh 116 pounds. It has just done wonders for me and I can do my housework now without one bit of trouble."—MRS. M. RIESSINGER, 10004 Nelson Ave., Cleveland, Ohio.

If some good fairy should appear, and offer to grant your heart's desire, what would you choose? Wealth? Happiness?

Health? That's the best gift. Health is riches that gold cannot buy and surely health is cause enough for happiness.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound may be the good fairy who offers you better health.

Rubber Walls the Latest

Rubber walls in office buildings to decrease vibrations, and streets and sidewalks paved with rubber, are among the recent uses chemists have found for the product, says Popular Mechanics Magazine. They have also adapted the material to the making of interior decorations and for coating silk and other fabrics so that scarcely a trace of the resilient substance can be detected. The rubber for use in buildings is in the form of blocks or slabs, which are built up vertically on the wall face.

The BABY

No mother in this enlightened age would give her baby something she did not know was perfectly harmless, especially when a few drops of plain Castoria will right a baby's stomach and end almost any little ill. Fretfulness and fever, too; it seems no time until everything is serene.

That's the beauty of Castoria; its gentle influence seems just what is needed. It does all that castor oil might accomplish, without shock to the system. Without the evil taste. It's delicious! Being purely vegetable, you can give it as often as there's a sign of colic; constipation; diarrhea; or need to aid sound, natural sleep.

Just one warning: it is genuine Fletcher's Castoria that physicians recommend. Other preparations may be just as free from all doubtful drugs, but no child of this writer's is going to test them! Besides, the book on care and feeding of babies that comes with Fletcher's Castoria is worth its weight in gold.

World Owes Much to St. Valentine

If for Nothing Else Than the Establishment of Pretty Custom.

It is a far cry from the year 270, with its pagan celebration and St. Valentine suffering martyrdom, down to the present one, and yet he still holds majesty in the heart of today. Down through seventeen centuries has persisted a pretty custom which proves that human nature does not, after all, change so very much.

The origin of observances of St. Valentine's day is somewhat clouded in obscurity, but it is fairly well established that the saint who met his death by being first beaten with clubs and then beheaded had very little to do with the celebration except that his day happened to be at hand when it became desirable to substitute a Christian festival for a long-established pagan observance.

In ancient Rome it was the custom during the greater part of the month of February to celebrate the Lupercalia, or feasts in honor of Pan and Juno; the latter deity was then named Februata, Februalis and Februlia. On these occasions part of the ceremonies consisted of placing in a box the names of young women and then as chance directed they were drawn out by the men.

Old Customs Modified.

The leaders of the early Christian church diplomatically endeavored to quash all such pagan celebrations and superstitions. This was chiefly accomplished through changing the forms somewhat or substituting other thoughts or ideas, for it had been proven that it was impossible altogether to extirpate a ceremony to which the masses had become attached through generations of observance. Accordingly the outline of ancient ceremonies was followed, but modified in ways more in keeping with the Christian era. St. Valentine was a recently martyred priest, and as the festival of the Lupercalia had commenced about the middle of February it was natural to choose his birthday as the day of celebrating the substituted feast.

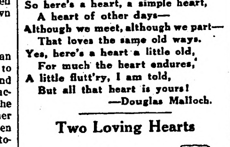
In various countries the celebration has taken on different aspects. At Norwich, in England, for instance, St. Valentine's eve is kept as a time for general giving and receiving gifts. In "Madder's Rambles in an Old City" is found a description of the scene, as follows: "The streets swarm with carriers and baskets laden with treasures; bang, bang, bang go the knockers and away rushes the banger, depositing first upon the doorstep some packages from the basket of stores. Again and again at intervals at every door to which a missive is addressed is the same repeated, till the baskets are empty. Anonymously St. Valentine presents his gifts, labeled only with 'St. Valentine's love' and 'Good morrow, Valentine.'"

"Fake" Valentines Common.

Many of the gifts were hoaxes, much like April Fools' day, for continuing, he says: "The mock parcels that vanish from the doorstep by invisible strings when the door opens, monster parcels that dwindle to thread, papers denuded of their multiplied envelopes, with fitting mottoes all tending to the final consummation of good counsel, 'Happy is he who expects nothing and he will not be disappointed.' It is a glorious night; marvel not that we would perpetuate so joyous a festivity."

In a series of essays published in England in 1754-6 other customs of the day are given. One miss, it is recorded, pinned a bay leaf to each corner of her pillow and placed a fifth in the center; if she dreamed of her sweetheart the marriage was sure to take place during the year.

As the celebration of St. Valentine comes down to the present generation it is one of purely sentimental remembrance, emphasizing the modern tendency to sweep away the cobwebs of antiquity and retain the sociable customs of merit.



Hearts Old and Young

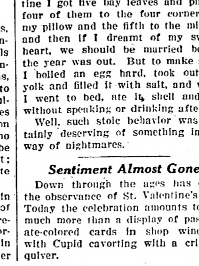
Young hearts are sending many a rime
To other hearts today,
And I've been thinking all the time
What old hearts have to say.
Young hearts are finding love is bliss
And life is full of song,
And what shall old hearts say to this,
Who knew it all along?

Well, here's a line to you, my dear,
From this old heart of mine;
The festal day of love is here,
And here's your valentine.
Young hearts are sending many a vow,
The way that young hearts do,
So let an old heart send one now,
And send it all to you.

So here's a heart, a simple heart,
A heart of other days—
Although we meet, although we part—
That loves the same old ways.
Yes, here's a heart a little old,
For much the heart endures,
A little flutt'ry, I am told,
But all that heart is yours!

—Douglas Malloch.

Two Loving Hearts



On St. Valentine's day
Look like that at a miss,
And you've got the girl pat
If she looks back like this.

Heroic Invocation

Maidens have always their little secret ways of invoking dreams. Here's a confession of such a maiden, 100 years ago: "The night before Valentine I got five bay leaves and pinned four of them to the four corners of my pillow and the fifth to the middle, and then if I dreamt of my sweetheart, we should be married before the year was out. But to make sure, I boiled an egg hard, took out the yolk and filled it with salt, and when I went to bed, ate it, shell and all, without speaking or drinking after it."

Well, such stoic behavior was certainly deserving of something in the way of nightmares.

Sentiment Almost Gone

Down through the ages has come the observance of St. Valentine's day. Today the celebration amounts to not much more than a display of passion-ate-colored cards in shop windows, with Cupid cavorting with a crimson quiver.

KEEPING TROUBLES OUT OF SIGHT

(© by D. J. Walsh.)

THERE was something wrong about Mrs. Penn, the woman who lived next door to Mrs. Shaw and opposite to Mrs. Dilworth. Mrs. Shaw and Mrs. Dilworth had been brought to speak about it that afternoon as they sat together. They were fast friends, and they had been telling each other a great many private things for years. It was inevitable that the matter of Edith Penn should come up between them some time, although they were loyal to her as a neighbor and charitable to her as an acquaintance and a woman.

"She doesn't ring true," Mary Shaw said.

"I've often thought that," Mrs. Dilworth sighed. "There's something about her I don't understand, although I have tried to—something that repels me. I've never mentioned it before because I supposed that I was the only person in the neighborhood who felt that way about her."

"You aren't," Mary Shaw said. "I feel the same way myself. She's a good neighbor; I couldn't wish for a better. She's always agreeable and pleasant—too pleasant. Apparently she never has any reason to be otherwise. I guess that's why—" She paused. "It doesn't seem natural," she went on thoughtfully, "for a person never to have annoyance or trouble of any kind. The rest of us who have had our deep valleys—well, I suppose we can't understand a person who seems to live constantly on the sunny hills of existence. And Mrs. Penn certainly appears always to be on the tip-top of the very sunniest hill. Perhaps that's why we don't undestand her. It's a good ways up there from one of our deep valleys."

Mrs. Shaw gulped a little and wiped away a tear. Her deep valley was the loss of her husband who had been her true companion for more than thirty years. Mrs. Dilworth said nothing, only rocked a little faster. Fifteen years before she had lost her only child, a little son, and the pain of bereavement was still very acute at times.

There was a tap at the door, a brisk "May I come in?" and Edith Penn entered with a small dish in her hand. She was a woman as old as either of the two who started at her appearance, but she had a youthful air, for her gown was gayly blue and her face danced with smiles.

"I've brought you over a bit of divinity fudge," she said to Mrs. Shaw. "I'm so glad Mrs. Dilworth is here. She can enjoy it, too."

Mrs. Shaw accepted the candy with just a shade of embarrassment. She felt a sense of guilt in that she had talked about her neighbor and was now accepting a gift from her.

"The candy is lovely," she said. "Do sit down."

Mrs. Penn shook her head, still smiling. It came to Mary Shaw that she had smiled so much that her face had taken on a rather set look, a strained look, one might say.

"No! I must hurry back. I've a thousand things to see to," she returned gayly.

"You are always so rushed," Mrs. Dilworth offered. "And only just you and Mr. Penn and the little boy to do for." The little boy was Mrs. Penn's grandson, who had come to her when his young mother died.

"I see you have been to visit your sister," Mary Shaw said.

"Yes. I stayed only one night. That was all Mr. Penn could spare me. You should have seen the house he and Frank kept! I had a stack of dishes that high to wash." She laughed and vanished.

The two women looked at each other gravely. But they said not a word more. Thoughtfully they tasted the candy. It was delicious.

"It ought to sour in our mouths after the way we've talked about her," Mary regretted.

"I was just going to say that," Mrs. Dilworth agreed.

After Mrs. Dilworth went home Mary Shaw washed the empty bonbon dish from which she had emptied the candy, for in their conscience-smittenness they had not been able to eat it, and throwing a shawl over her head, went to return the dish to Mrs. Penn. She found Frankie making a snow man in the front yard.

"Go right in, Mis' Shaw," he lisped. "Gran's making me a pair of pants."

Mrs. Shaw tapped lightly, as a warning, and entered. She heard a sound of sobbing and stopped, motionless with amazement. Sobs! They came from the sitting room. There was something else, too—Mrs. Penn was saying, "Oh, dear!" over and over again.

"She's sick—in pain," Mary Shaw thought, and hurried forward.

Mrs. Penn lay on the couch with her face in her arms, a pathetic, grief-stricken figure. As Mrs. Shaw bent over and laid a hand on her shoulder she started and looked up.

"What is it?" demanded Mrs. Shaw, sinking down beside her and putting an arm about her. "Are you sick? Tell me so I can do something for you."

But Mrs. Penn merely sobbed incoherently. Presently she said thickly: "Lock the door so Frankie can't get in here. I—I wouldn't have him see me like this for the world. He has never seen me cry."

Mrs. Shaw locked the doors and then returned to her seat beside the weeping woman.

"My dear!" she said, with that understanding that comes only once in a thousand times, perhaps, even to the best of men, "it's all been a bluff, hasn't it?"

Edith Penn gripped the kind hand, looked into the sympathetic eyes, and gave herself to confession.

"I should say it has all been a bluff," she replied. "And I'm sick of bluffing. I'm tired of pretending. I—I hate myself for going round with that silly grin on my face and trying to make people believe it came there by itself. But it doesn't. I put it on every morning just the way I do my clothes. Let me tell you! I took you that candy this afternoon as an excuse, hoping I'd find you alone. I thought maybe I could tell you, but Mrs. Dilworth was there. Oh, my face aches with keeping things out of sight! I've always made the best of everything. My whole life is one fabrication, and what good has it done to me or anybody else? I don't believe it's true that the world is better for your keeping your trouble out of sight. I believe that the give-and-take sympathy creates a bond between people—a needed bond!"

"I have always believed that," Mary Shaw said.

"I've always had to cry my eyes out in secret while I smiled in the face of the whole world," Edith Penn went on. "Even my husband has never suspected that I had cause to shed a single tear. In that way I haven't been true to him, perhaps, but it was the way I was brought up. My mother was the kind of woman who would give our dinner away to somebody who didn't need it, while we did, just for the sake of keeping up appearances. 'My sister—'" Her lips quivered. "My sister has always been like mother, until yesterday. Yesterday she told me—that she has only six months at best to live. I smiled. I said, 'Six months is a long time.' Then I came home and kept right on smiling. But I've reached the point where I can't smile any more. I love her, and I am going to lose her. And I'm going to cry about it if I want to."

She did cry again, stormily, while Mrs. Shaw soothed and comforted her.

It was not Edith Penn's first deep valley by any means, but it was the first time she had walked there with another woman who knew the length and breadth of deep valleys. In Mary Shaw she had found the friend she needed.

And Mary Shaw, too, had found something which she would in time make known to all women—a brave heart that had masqueraded under a smile in order to hide its suffering.

Process of Changes of the Infant Mind

The ultimate standard of value among human beings is personality; hence its development is of supreme importance. The germ of mental life in the human infant exhibits one of the most striking instances of evolution to be found in nature.

Greater changes take place in the mind of an infant in a few years than in ages of plant or animal evolution. This germ of mental life is so constituted that it tends to develop according to inner laws, as does a grain of wheat, yet it is greatly modified in its development by its environment, physical and psychical.

The infant is in somewhat of the condition of a man who should find himself in a shop where machines of all sorts were in motion. He would at first have no control over them. By noticing what happened after each motion and by pulling various cranks and levers he would learn to know what to expect at any moment and could ultimately control the various machines.

In a similar way does the babe gradually gain control of his bodily movements. In the meantime the conscious states that are experienced are organized into a conscious self.—From "The Individual in the Making," by E. A. Kirkpatrick.

Weasel's Fashion Title

Ermine—weasel. It would probably be a shock to royalty to know they are one and the same.

The elegant white ermine that constitutes the collar or robes of king and prince is the fur of the weasel in its white winter phase. The same marauder of the hen coops, who is the poultry raiser's most persistent enemy, becomes valuable to the trapper in the winter for the pelt it yields.

Prime weasel pelts, styled as ermine in the trapper's price list, bring a couple of dollars. In the dead of winter the weasel is entirely white, save for the tip of its tail, which is black.

In summer the weasel is brown and its fur is worthless.

Look Out for the Snails

In some parts of Wales the natives indulge in the thrills of a snail race. With a dash of paint upon their shells to identify them the snails are started across a space about a yard square, being attracted to the end by a pile of wet ivy leaves. The snails often develop an unfortunate habit of going to sleep during the race and they must be jockeyed by the use of small sticks by their owners. The owners of the snail which crosses the line first takes the purse.

If Back Hurts Begin on Salts

Flush Your Kidneys Occasionally by Drinking Quarts of Good Water

No man or woman can make a mistake by flushing the kidneys occasionally, says a well-known authority. Too much rich food creates acids which clog the kidney pores so that they sluggishly filter or strain only part of the waste and poisons from the blood. Then you get sick. Rheumatism, headaches, liver trouble, nervousness, constipation, dizziness, sleeplessness, bladder disorders often come from sluggish kidneys.

The moment you feel a dull ache in the kidneys or your back hurts, or if the urine is cloudy, offensive, full of sediment, irregular of passage, or attended by a sensation of scalding, begin to drink soft water in quantities; also get about four ounces of Jad Salts from any reliable pharmacy and take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast for a few days and your kidneys may then act fine.

This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to help flush clogged kidneys and stimulate them to activity, also to help neutralize the acids in the system so they no longer cause irritation, thus often relieving bladder disorders.

Jad Salts is inexpensive and cannot injure; makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink, which everyone can take now and then to help keep the kidneys clean and the blood pure, thereby often preventing serious kidney complications.

Retort Courteous

During a reception which followed the performance of a French troupe in Berlin, a comedienne found herself sitting next to a German officer who offered her a glass of Rhine wine.

"This wine is excellent," he said, "but of course I am sorry that it isn't champagne." Then he added: "The German army hopes to have the pleasure of drinking some in France, some day."

Quick as a flash the French girl retorted: "We don't serve our prisoners champagne, M'sieu."
